If an employer or insurer seeks to have an agreement for compensation terminated because the disability of the employee has ceased, it may be a condition precedent to an application for such relief that payment in accordance with the terms of the agreement has been made,⁵⁶ on the theory that a party in default of an approved agreement for compensation has not the right to invoke or receive affirmative relief by a petition to review while such default continues;⁵⁷ but continued payment of compensation pursuant to settlement and award up to the time of the employer's application for review thereof because of changed conditions is not necessarily a condition precedent to the making of such application,⁵⁸ although where an employer or insurance carrier is in default for a considerable period of time before applying for review it may be barred of such right.⁵⁹

Where the commission has approved a lump sum agreement not constituting a final settlement of the employer's entire liability, but constituting merely a commutation of the remaining weeks of the award, it is not a condition precedent in proceedings for additional compensation that there first be an appeal from the lump sum award secured by the lump sum agreement,⁶⁰ or a request or application to set aside such award;⁶¹ and where a settlement is made on a lump sum basis, it is not necessary that such settlement be set aside in order for the employee to recover such further compensation as may be due him.⁶²

Notice. Ordinarily, a provision barring the right to compensation if notice to the employer is not given within a specified period of time has no application to a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee;⁶³ and the original notice of injury precedent to a subsequent settlement and award for specified injuries has been held sufficient notice to warrant a later award for different injuries thereafter developing from the same accident.⁶⁴ If a compensation board or commission entertains an employee's supplemental claim for compensation for disability recurring after the execution of a compensation settlement receipt, a presumption arises that any irregularity in the giving of the original notice has been waived.⁶⁵ Under statutes providing for review on notice to the parties interested, where an agreement for compensation constituting an award has been made, such award may not subsequently be changed in the employee's favor without notice to the employer.⁶⁶

§ 906. Application

Applications and petitions to review compensation agreements and settlements on the ground of a change in the condition of the employee, ordinarily, are governed by the general rules of pleading, although technical rules of pleading are not usually applied.

An application or petition to review an agreement for compensation to obtain an increase, diminution, termination, or reinstatement of compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, ordinarily, is governed by the rules of pleading which are applied in workmen's compensation cases;⁶⁷ but the technical rules of pleading do not apply in such proceedings,⁶⁸ and, accordingly, such applications or petitions should be liberally construed.⁶⁹ The rule of liberal construction will not be carried so far as to permit granting of relief where the petition wholly fails to apprise the other party that such relief was sought,⁷⁰ and, thus, an application or petition for review may be ineffective to secure the requested relief if it does not contain the essential averments.⁷¹ On the other hand, a petition or application is sufficient if it affords the adverse party ample notice of the claim against which that party has to defend.⁷²

The fact that an application or petition for review is improperly designated does not change the substance of the application or petition, or destroy any of the rights or obligations that are provided for by the compensation act,⁷³ since formal inaccuracy in the designation of a petition does not constitute cause for the denial of the proper relief;⁷⁴ and such relief as is proper may be granted without regard to the particular provision of the compensation act which is cited in the application or petition.⁷⁵

If an agreement for compensation is unapproved and a change occurs in the condition of the employee, the remedy to obtain additional compensation is by an original petition for compensation rather than by a petition for review, which would be the proper remedy had the agreement been approved.⁷⁶ A petition to terminate or modify an agreement may operate as a supersedeas permitting the discontinuance of payments as of the date of filing the petition, but for a petition to have such effect it must be in accordance with the statutory requirements.⁷⁷ In the construction of applica-

§ 907. Evidence

- a. Presumptions and burden of proof
- b. Admissibility
- c. Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

In a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, the burden of proving change in condition rests on the party asserting that a change has occurred.

The burden of proof rests on the one claiming a change in condition following settlement and award to establish the fact of such change,⁷⁹ and the burden of establishing that a compensation board or commission has approved an agreement or settlement rests on the party relying on the agreement or settlement.⁸⁰ The burden is on an employee seeking increase or reinstatement of compensation following settlement and award to prove that he is entitled to reopen the case,⁸¹ and to show the facts essential to the relief sought by way of modification of a prior approved agreement,⁸² or setting it aside,⁸³ or the grant of further or additional compensation.⁸⁴ In this connection the burden rests on claimant, where such facts are in issue, to show that the injury arose out of, and in the course of, his employment,⁸⁵ and that the condition for which he seeks increased compensation is the result of the original injury;⁸⁶ and where he seeks further compensation following discontinuance of payments under an agreement, claimant has the burden of proving his incapacity since such discontinuance and as a result of injury connected with his employment.⁸⁷

After payment has been made under an agreement for compensation and a final receipt has been given, in a proceeding to set aside the final receipt because of a change in the condition of the employee, as where there has been a recurrence of the disability, the burden of proof is on the employee to establish the grounds for setting aside the final receipt;⁸⁸ but after a final receipt has been set aside and the agreement for compensation rein-

Procedure assuming or shifting burden

Where there is a serious dispute on question of causal connection between compensation claimant's injury and an existing disability, an employer should petition for a termination of agreement for compensation, thus assuming burden of proof, which is rightfully employer's burden, that disability from accident has ended, and a final receipt should not be taken merely as a device to shift that burden to employee.

In Michigan

(1) Rule was recognized that where a settlement receipt had been approved, claimant had burden of proof of showing that receipt was not in accordance with facts.

(2) In order to bring cases in which no settlement receipt had been approved within application of above rule, department of labor and industries issued General Order No. 30 providing that in cases where settlement receipts had been filed prior to a stated date, and in which there had been no further proceedings, such receipts were approved as though approved individually.

(3) Effect of General Order No. 30 was not to give blanket approval to all settlement receipts to which it applied, but to establish a procedural rule whereby burden of proof was placed on a party attacking a settlement receipt approved by General Order No. 30.

stated, the burden then rests on the employer to prove that the employee's disability has temporarily ceased and that he no longer suffers a loss of earning power.⁸⁹

An agreement for compensation is prima facie evidence of a compensable accident,⁹⁰ and the burden of proof rests on an employer or insurance carrier to show that it is entitled to diminution or termination of compensation.⁹¹ On petition to re-

Proceeding for compensation

Where insurance company stopped making payments under agreement to pay claimant compensation for permanent total disability, and claimant filed claim petition for compensation, burden of proof on petition was not on insurance company and employer to prove a decrease of disability but on claimant to sustain by preponderant evidence claim asserted therein that permanent disability was total.

N.J.—Ferraro v. Zurcher, 79 A.2d 473, 12 N.J.Super. 231.

Burden of proof not unreasonable

In proceeding by employer and insurance carrier for modification of workmen's compensation agreement on ground of decrease of employee's disability, wherein compensation board affirmed referee's finding that employee was totally disabled, and further stated that employer and insurance carrier failed to sustain their burden to establish change in disability because their experts had expressed opinion that disability had been reduced but did not venture to state that employee was unable to do any work, an unwarranted, arbitrary, and unreasonable burden of proof was not placed on insurance carrier and employer.

First burden on employer

In proceedings on employer's petition for review of preliminary agreement, providing for payment of compensation for total incapacity, on ground that incapacity of employee had ended or diminished, it was error for trial judge, who had found employee sufficiently recovered to resume light work, to require employee to go ahead with duty of producing evidence as to his good faith and cooperation in attempt to attain light work without first requiring petitioning employer to establish that it had cooperated sufficiently at least prima facie to discharge its burden in that regard.

R.I.—Moss Const. Co. v. Boiani, 125 A.2d 147.

Work in nature of odd jobs

In workmen's compensation proceeding to review preliminary agreement on ground employee's total incapacity had ended or diminished, evidence sustained trial justice's finding that employee was unable to do any kind of light work in general but could do only work in nature of odd jobs not generally obtainable and that employer had not pointed out or suggested any light work which employee could perform or by his own efforts might reasonably obtain, and trial justice's conclusion that employer had failed to sustain burden of proof as required.

R.I.—Scialo Bros. v. Marini, 115 A. 2d 359.

Availability of work

An employer seeking modification of workmen's compensation agreement on ground of decrease of employee's liability is not required to show in every case that work which employee is able to do is available and has been offered to him.

employer or insurer expects to establish that disability has terminated rather than merely diminished, to produce evidence to show that the employee is capable of performing the work that was being done at the time of the injury.⁹⁴

The evidence required to set aside a final receipt must be definite, precise, specific, credible, and reasonably satisfactory,⁹⁵ and must be of a more definite and specific nature than that on which initial compensation is based;⁹⁶ the purpose of this rule being to prevent the maintenance of false claims, and to give some degree of assurance to the employer that his liability has ended or will not be re-established unless it is on evidence which clearly warrants it.⁹⁷

Presumptions. Where a compensation act so provides, there is a presumption that at the time a final receipt is signed claimant's disability had ceased,⁹⁸ but the presumption may be overcome on the presentation of competent testimony.⁹⁹ Where an employee's petition contains allegations showing that he was in possession of normal faculties up to and through the day of a compensation settlement, it will be presumed that he had capacity to execute the settlement.¹

In a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, the rules as to the admissibility of evidence in compensation proceedings generally are applicable.

The general rules as to the admissibility of evidence in workmen's compensation proceedings, which are discussed supra §§ 525-546, are generally held to be applicable in proceedings to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee,² and, in such proceedings, under the generally recognized rules, evidence which is material on an issue is usually admissible,³ while irrelevant evidence is not admissible.⁴ Accordingly, where an application for review and modification of an agreement for compensation is based solely on an alleged change in the condition of the employee, and with no suggestion of fraud being made, evidence as to fraud is not admissible.⁵ Similarly, on review of an approved agreement for compensation where a change in the condition of the employee is alleged as the ground for review, evidence that the condition causing disability was not the result of accident may be incompetent and inadmissible, and an award decreasing compensation cannot be based thereon.⁶ Evidence which might otherwise be inadmissible may be introduced by agreement of the parties.⁷ The agreement for compensation may be admissible against the employer and insurer as a declaration against interest.⁸

The testimony of medical experts is generally admissible in such proceedings,⁹ and a physician does not usurp the function of the court in testifying that an employee is able to resume his ordinary

1. Tex.—Wiggins v. Standard Accident Ins. Co., Civ.App., 61 S.W.2d 579.

2. Qualification of medical experts

Fact that certain physicians who testified in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation were specialists in particular field of medicine under consideration, and that other physicians who testified were not specialists, would not affect admissibility of their testimony.

R.I.—Morton C. Tuttle Co. v. Carbone, 125 A.2d 133.

Evidence bearing on credibility

In employer's action to review preliminary agreement for compensation for total incapacity, cross-examination of employee concerning time of his return to work for employer after receiving lump sum payment for a previous injury was proper as bearing on credibility of employee in view of his inconsistent statements in superior court and before director of labor.

R.I.—Narragansett Hotel, Inc. v. Mallozzi, 103 A.2d 355, 81 R.I. 389.

Evidence held admissible

In proceeding to review compensation agreement, evidence that petitioner had performed his usual heavy work satisfactorily and for an appreciable time without complaint and without asking for lighter work, medical attention, or compensation, and had voluntarily left job solely to get better wages, was admissible on question of disability and loss of earning power.

Examination one year prior to testifying

"It is our judgment that we should not hold as a matter of law that an opinion given by a medical witness and based on an examination of an injured person made about one year prior to the date the witness testi-

occupation.¹⁰ The report of a physician examining an injured employee on behalf of the employer or insurer may be admissible in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation, although a copy of the report was not sent to the employee or his attorney in strict compliance with the requirements of the statute, if the failure to follow the statutory prescribed procedure does not prejudice the rights of the injured employee.¹¹

Where an award of compensation is based on a receipt and report or stipulation is made by the compensation board or commission, and, it being impossible to determine from the order, receipt, report, or stipulation what character of disability was determined or included in the award, the board or commission, on a subsequent hearing, may consider competent evidence to determine the character or extent of disability determined by the prior award.¹²

Requirement of competent evidence

Where an employee enters into an agreement with his employer and insurance carrier based on a percentage of permanent partial disability, he is not entitled to an additional award on ground of a change in condition for worse unless there is competent evidence authorizing a finding that his condition has changed for worse since original agreement and award. Ga.—Phinney v. Ocean Acc. & Guaranty Corp., 58 S.E.2d 921, 81 Ga. App. 394.

Evidence introduced by agreement held sufficient

Employee's contention that there was no legal evidence to support finding of trial court that employer offered her light factory work on ground that letter in support of such finding was addressed to employee's attorney, but not to her was without merit, where letter was put in evidence by agreement at hearing of workmen's compensation case in which employer sought reduction of total disability compensation. R.I.—Gorham Mfg. Co. v. Viselli, 52 A.2d 517, 72 R.I. 427.

Determination as to weight and credibility

In proceeding by employer and insurance carrier for modification of workmen's compensation agreement on ground of decrease of employee's disability, it was exclusive province of compensation authorities to pass on weight and credibility of testimony of medical experts, and authorities could accept testimony of employee's experts and reject testimony of employer's experts.

Qualification of medical experts

Fact that certain physicians who testified in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation were specialists in particular field of medicine under consideration, and that other physicians were not specialists, would go only to weight of their testimony.

R.I.—Morton C. Tuttle Co. v. Carbone, 125 A.2d 133.

14. Mo.—Brown v. Corn Products Refining Co., App., 55 S.W.2d 706.

No final determination

In a proceeding to obtain additional compensation, evidence was held sufficient to establish that a prior determination of compensation bureau was not a final adjudication precluding employee's claim for increased disability compensation.

c. Weight and Sufficiency

In proceedings to review agreements for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, the general rules governing weight and sufficiency of evidence are applicable.

The general rules governing weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in proceedings to review an agreement for compensation, or an award based on such agreement, for the purpose of obtaining an increase, diminution, termination, suspension, or reinstatement of compensation.¹³ Accordingly, these rules have been applied in respect of the evidence requisite to show the making of a valid settlement not subject to review for change of condition,¹⁴ or to support an award for resumption¹⁵ or reinstatement¹⁶ of compensation, or to show the existence of grounds for reopening, review or change of settlements and awards based thereon, as to show a change in conditions,¹⁷ such as an in-

Proceeding to compel resumption of compensation payments

(1) Evidence sustained finding that employee had tried in good faith to perform janitor work and to accept

ficient²⁶ to support findings made by the compensation board or commission, and evidence has been held sufficient to show that, because of the agreement for compensation, the employee was denied compensation in accordance with compensation law;²⁷ and evidence has also been held sufficient to show that the compensation provided by the agreement was wholly inadequate to compensate for nonschedule injuries.²⁸ In such a proceeding, evidence has been held sufficient to support a finding of maximum partial compensation for the injury sustained,²⁹ or to show that subsequent disability was the result of the compensable accident,³⁰ or to show no disability, in addition to that which was the basis of the agreement, sufficient to entitle the employee to additional compensation,³¹ or to show the ability of the employee to resume ordinary and usual work,³² or to show loss of earning capacity.³³

In an employer's proceeding to review an agreement for compensation for total incapacity, where evidence showed that the employee was only partially incapacitated, the failure to show what a person such as the employee could earn in a partially incapacitated condition warrants the continuance of compensation for total incapacity.³⁴ In a proceeding to secure additional compensation after an award on a stipulated agreement, evidence may be sufficient to show as a matter of law that such award was not a compromise final settlement of all liability, but that the claim was left open to future adjustment.³⁵

In a proceeding for modification of an agreement for compensation because of an alleged change in the condition of the employee, where there is a conflict in the testimony, as between a medical expert and the employee, the board or commission is not required to accept the testimony of the medical expert,³⁶ and the testimony of the employee may be sufficient to support the finding of the board or commission.³⁷ However, in such a proceeding medical testimony may be sufficient to support a finding of the board or commission,³⁸ and, where the circumstances are such that the testimony of laymen would not be sufficient to establish the point in issue, medical testimony may be essential to support a finding of the board or commission.³⁹

In other proceedings particular evidence has been held insufficient to warrant modification,⁴⁰ terminaate in experiment to ascertain extent of his incapacity and to rehabilitate himself in conformity with decision of director of labor.

R.I.—Fresselli v. Washburn Wire Co., 64 A.2d 686, 75 R.I. 144.

(2) Evidence sustained finding that discharge of employee after he had been reemployed as jamitor was not based on employee's unwillingness to cooperate in attempt at rehabilitation but was based rather on employee's unwillingness to perform his original heavy work or to shovel and lift substantial weights, and warranted conclusion that discharge was in effect a withdrawal by employer of offer to give employee light work.

tion,⁴¹ or reinstatement⁴² of the agreement, or the setting aside of a lump sum settlement,⁴³ or insufficient to show a change in the physical condition of the employee,⁴⁴ or to show that permanent and total disability resulted from the compensable injury.⁴⁵ Similarly, particular evidence has been held insufficient to show recurrence of,⁴⁶ or increase in,⁴⁷ disability, or no recurrence of disability,⁴⁸ or that the employee's disability had ceased,⁴⁹ or had ceased at the time alleged,⁵⁰ or that the employee's disability was not caused by the original accident,⁵¹ or a causal connection between the compensable injuries which were the subject of the agreement and the subsequent cause of the employee's disability,⁵² or a decrease in the employee's earning capacity,⁵³ or that a prior physical condition rather than the accident was the cause of the employee's disability,⁵⁴ or that because of the disability the employee was capable of performing only light work.⁵⁵

Sufficiency of evidence as to limitations. In a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, particular evidence has been held sufficient to establish the applicability of a statute of limitations,⁵⁶ or insufficient to show that a claim for additional compensation was barred by limitations,⁵⁷ or insufficient to show such fraud as would extend the period provided by statute.⁵⁸

§ 908. Hearing or Trial

There should be a determination of all issues properly raised in the proceeding, and the determination should be such as is warranted by the circumstances of the case.

In a proceeding to review, reopen, set aside, or terminate an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, the tribunal exercising jurisdiction should determine all issues which are properly raised in the proceeding,⁵⁹ but there may be no determination of mat-

Plaintiff's unsubstantiated claim of continuing pain was insufficient to authorize setting aside of compromise judgment and award of additional compensation in view of preponderance of medical testimony that only injury from which plaintiff could be suffering was one which occurred two years before accident for which compensation was sought, and in view of impeaching evidence that prior to compromise judgment, plaintiff accepted compensation for total disability while performing his regular work and drawing regular wages.

Postponement of determination improper

ters which are not within the scope of the proceeding.⁶⁰ It may be determined whether claimant is entitled to further or additional compensation,⁶¹ as, whether there has been a recurrence of disability attributable to accident,⁶² or whether the injury which was the subject of the agreement continued to incapacitate the employee totally or partially,⁶³ and it has been stated that in such proceeding the inquiry is limited to a determination on the single issue of whether the disability has recurred, increased, diminished, or ended subsequent to the original finding.⁶⁴ In a proceeding of this nature the employer may be precluded from questioning the applicability of the compensation act, whether the injured claimant was actually an employee, whether the injuries sustained arose out of, and in the scope of, an employee's duties, and whether the injured employee gave notice of injury and made claim for compensation within the time prescribed by the act.⁶⁵

pensation agreement on the ground of a change in disability, the inquiry goes directly to the question of whether disability has increased,⁶⁶ and it should be determined whether there is any existing disability.⁶⁷ If existing disability is found, the extent of such disability should be determined,⁶⁸ and if subsequent to the agreement there has been a change in the extent of disability, the date on which such change occurred should be determined.⁶⁹ On the hearing of a petition for review of a compensation agreement on the ground of termination of disability, the board or commission should consider evidence with respect to the status or condition of the employee subsequent to the agreement and prior to the filing of the petition.⁷⁰

A provision that the filing of a petition for the termination of an agreement for compensation operates as a supersedeas of the terms of the agreement to the extent subsequently justified by the evidence contemplates a prompt ascertainment of the earning power of an injured employee;⁷¹ and board improperly refrained from determining amount of permanent physical impairment and improperly continued hearing until such time as claimant's condition became fixed and determinable.

Idaho.—McCall v. Potlatch Forests, 182 P.2d 156, 67 Idaho 415.

Matters for determination

Under power to review payments after disapproval of settlement, department of labor and industry must determine physical condition, earnings, and earning capacity of claimant, and payments made by employer, and make such determination of amount due employee as facts warrant, for which amount employee would be entitled to certificate for judgment.

Mich.—Poisson v. Department of Labor and Industry, 274 N.W. 336, 280 Mich. 583.

Peremptory instruction

On trial of suit brought by employee to set aside compensation board's award denying application to review order approving compromise compensation agreement, it is error to give peremptory instruction for defendant where evidence is sufficient to raise an issue as to fact of change in condition of employee. where on a petition to terminate an agreement for compensation it is established that the employee's disability has not ceased although it has decreased from total disability to partial disability, an order holding the entire matter in abeyance and compelling the employee to forego all compensation until he has furnished a practical demonstration of his earning power by engaging in some kind of employment is not such an order as is authorized by the compensation act.⁷²

Where a proceeding is brought to set aside an injured employee's final receipt on the ground that disability continues, if the receipt is not set aside the matter is at an end.⁷³ If, however, an order is made setting aside the final receipt, the effect of such order is automatically to restore the parties to the position they would have been in had the receipt never been signed;⁷⁴ and the order operates to revive the compensation agreement which was in effect at the time the receipt was given,⁷⁵ and presents the issue as to the degree of partial disability which exists as reflected in earning power.⁷⁶

In a proceeding to review, reopen, set aside, modify, terminate, or reinstate an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, or because of a change in the earning capacity of the employee, the award, decree, order, or other determination that is made should be such as is warranted by the circumstances of the case.⁷⁷ While the determination that will be made will depend to an extent on the averments, proof, and findings,⁷⁸ a liberal attitude will be taken in considering the substance of the relief prayed for rather than its form,⁷⁹ and a form of relief other than that requested may be granted.⁸⁰ Where a proceeding has been brought by an injured employee for modification of an agreement for compensation on the ground there has been a change in the employee's condition, in making a finding adverse to the employee the compensation board or commission is not limited to dismissing the employee's petition and thus reinstating the agreement;⁸¹ and even though the employer does not petition for reduction in compensation, the board, commission, or referee may review the compensation agreement and make such modification in it as is warranted, and may make an award for partial disability.⁸²

The determination that is made may be that compensation payments shall be suspended,⁸³ or that under certain circumstances compensation payments shall be terminated or suspended, or the amount decreased,⁸⁴ or the determination may be that periodic payments be continued until there is some further change in the condition of the employee.⁸⁵ However, if the suspension of an agreement under which compensation had been paid for total disability would be authorized only on averment, proof, and

After a final receipt has been set aside, theoretically a new petition by employer is required before board or commission may modify or terminate agreement; but in practice compensation authorities regard employer's answer to petition to set aside final receipt as a denial of alleged grounds for setting aside receipt, and where evidence indicates a disability less than that provided for in revived agreement, as a petition to modify or terminate agreement, and, on that hypothesis, it is proper for board or commission to consider evidence of extent of disability and its effect on earning power, and to modify or terminate revived agreement accordingly.

Effect of change in earnings

Change in injured employee's earnings has nothing to do with his right to compensation but only with amount thereof that must be paid by employer or insurance carrier, and therefore fact that change in employee's earnings was not related to any change in employee's disability or his physical condition had no bearing on employee's right to recover benefits to which he became entitled because of change in his earning capacity.

finding that such disability had temporarily ceased, the absence of such averment, proof and finding prevents suspension of the agreement.⁸⁶ If the payments an employee is receiving under an agreement are suspended because of the fact that the employee is receiving the same wages as prior to the accident, the suspension does not terminate the agreement;⁸⁷ and it may come into operation again if the suspension is lifted by reason of the employee receiving less wages than he received prior to the accident.⁸⁸

The determination may be that payments of compensation shall be suspended or terminated on the happening of a specified condition, such as, if the employee refuses to submit to a surgical operation,⁸⁹ or if the employee refuses to accept work offered by the employer,⁹⁰ or the determination may be that compensation payments are to be suspended for as long a period as a specified condition exists.⁹¹ Determinations of this nature should not, however, be too broad,⁹² and should not give the employer an unwarranted degree of discretion.⁹³

The determination that is made on petition or application to review may be final or interlocutory,⁹⁴ and interlocutory only as to the extent of partial incapacity.⁹⁵ An award of further compensation may constitute an effectual determination that there was no approval of a settlement receipt.⁹⁶

An employer's petition for termination of an agreement for compensation on the ground that disability has ceased, if dismissed, fixes the status of parties as of the date of the dismissal, in the absence of appeal therefrom;⁹⁷ but the dismissal of a prior petition does not necessarily preclude a subsequent petition for termination,⁹⁸ and the dismissal of such petition does not preclude the employee from making application for further compensation,⁹⁹ although the dismissal of the employer's petition to terminate the agreement may, if not appealed from, deny the employee the right to obtain further compensation due prior to the date the employer's petition was filed.¹

In a proceeding on an employer's petition to review an agreement for compensation, the denial of the employee's motion for extra medical expense on jurisdictional grounds does not preclude the employee from claiming such expenses on his petition to review the compensation agreement.²

Where it is determined that additional compensation should be awarded, the amount that will be awarded should be such as is authorized by the compensation act,³ and, in determining the amount that should be paid as additional compensation because of the change in the condition of the employee, a deduction or allowance may be proper because of the amount paid under the agreement.⁴ In the absence of a binding final settlement by way of commutation, it has been held that a lump sum payment

Increase in amount rather than rate
Where compensation in addition to that provided for by settlement was authorized, compensation act did not restrict additional award to increase in rate, but permitted increase in amount.

Place where rate of pay computed

Where employee, who was resident of Kansas, returned to Kansas following termination of his employment in Alaska, during course of which he sustained injuries and entered into settlement, any additional compensation allowable to employee for disability continuing after return to Kansas should be based on amount of pay employee would have received at same type of employment in state of Kansas and not on Alaska rate of pay.

Adjustment of payment

Where after making settlement agreement employee makes application for additional compensation because of change of conditions, he is not entitled to receive further payments until amount received in settlement, applied to temporary total disability or a fixed and increased permanent partial disability, which may thereafter be fixed, has been absorbed out of portion of settlement representing permanent partial disability theretofore allowed.

made prior to an award for increased compensation on change of condition to total disability should be applied to cover payments from its effective date at the weekly rate for total disability until exhausted.⁵

If a statute so provides, an award of additional compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee may not operate retroactively to the date of the injury, but would have only a prospective effect from the date of the order for additional compensation.⁶ Furthermore, if an allowance is proper for interest, the interest that will be allowed may be only on payments due after the date of the filing of the motion or petition to reopen.⁷ Where it is determined on an employer's application to terminate compensation provided for by agreement that the employee's disability is partial, and full compensation for partial disability is paid, and subsequently a petition is filed by the employee for further compensation, although it may be found that disability increased during the period compensation for partial disability was paid, the employee will not be permitted to recover additional compensation for such period,⁸ or for any period during which the determination that the employee's disability was partial was in effect.⁹

In a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation, an award of additional compensation which is to continue until a further order is made, should expressly provide that payments shall not continue beyond the period prescribed by the compensation act.¹⁰ Where a provision of a compensation act requires that payment under an agreement must be made up to the date of filing of a petition to terminate, in the absence of payment as required no termination may be granted because of a change in the condition of the employee.¹¹ Where a compensation act provides that when an employer is in default in payments under an agreement therefor, claimant may file a copy of the agreement with the prothonotary of the court and obtain the entry of judgment, such provision has been held to be applicable to a reinstated agreement for compensation.¹²

A proceeding for review of an agreement for compensation is not rendered null and void and of no effect because the commissioner conducting the hearing fails to enter a decree within the period specified by the compensation act,¹³ and a proceeding of this nature is not invalid simply because the employee is not represented by counsel.¹⁴

Where a decree is entered by the trial court granting an employer's petition to terminate an agreement for compensation and suspending payments under the agreement, the filing of an appeal from such decree will, under a statute so providing, supersede the decree and permit the employee to prosecute a contempt proceeding against the employer for failing to make payments under the agreement;¹⁵ but when on appeal the decree is affirmed, the obligation of the employer to make further payments after the date the appeal is decided ends, although the employee may recover payments for the period from the filing of the appeal until the determination of the appeal.¹⁶

Questions of law and fact. Ordinarily, it is the province of the compensation board or commission, rather than that of the court, to pass on and decide questions of fact presented on a petition or application to review or reinstate an agreement for compensation.¹⁷ Usually it is a question of fact for the trier of such questions whether there has been a change in the condition of the employee,¹⁸ whether an agreement for compensation for total disability should be modified because the employee was no longer totally disabled,¹⁹ and an award or order made in such a proceeding may be subject to reversal in the absence of the findings required by law.²⁰ Where a claim for compensation is made

Findings held superfluous
In proceeding to set aside supplewithin the time prescribed by statute, and compensation is paid under an unapproved settlement agreement, and subsequently there is further disability which the employee alleges is a recurrence of the original disability, substantial evidence tending to connect the subsequent disability with the original injury may present a proper jury question.²¹

Findings. In proceedings involving review of compensation agreements and awards based thereon, the general rules as to findings apply,²² and findings should be made in accordance with the requirements of the compensation law.²³ Findings should be made on matters, and only on matters, which are properly in issue in the proceeding,²⁴ and, under some statutes, a decision by a compensation commissioner may not constitute an unqualified finding, but only a provisional order.²⁵ A finding may be valid although it is irregular in form,²⁶ although a finding may be so defective that it is insufficient to form the basis of an award for additional compensation.²⁷

If a finding made in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation is ambiguous, it will be construed in the light of circumstances so as to give reasonable effect both to the finding and to the general disposition of the case.²⁸ A finding as to disability during a certain period of time is not necessarily res judicata as to disability during a different period of time.²⁹ Ordinarily, only ultimate findings of fact may be set out in the decree that is entered in a proceeding for review of an agreement for compensation.³⁰

Characterization of evidence

Where trial judge characterized evidence as strongly preponderant of a neurotic condition, it did not constitute such a finding as was required by compensation act, particularly where there was nothing to this effect as a finding contained in decree.

§ 909. Rehearing

After there has been a hearing on an application to modify, terminate, or reinstate an agreement for compensation, there may, in a proper case, be a rehearing of the application.

If a party to a proceeding to modify an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee fails to sustain the burden of proof, the party should be accorded an opportunity to supply the deficiencies in proof by granting a rehearing;³¹ but the refusal to grant a rehearing may not constitute reversible error if the party has the right to bring another proceeding to obtain modification of the agreement.³² After the compensation authorities have made a final determination as to a petition for further compensation, they have no power to grant a rehearing as to such determination,³³ and an agreement for compensation which has been finally terminated may not be reinstated by an unauthorized rehearing,³⁴ although a subsequent change in condition may warrant a new hearing.³⁵

An application for rehearing is one remedy that may be available to correct an erroneous order dismissing a petition for reinstatement of an agreement for compensation;³⁶ and when an order is made terminating an agreement for compensation on the ground that the employee has returned to work at the same rate of pay he formerly was receiving, the failure of the employee to seek a rehearing will be tantamount to an acquiescence by the employee in the termination of the compensation agreement.³⁷

unless the employee appeals from the order, as discussed infra § 910. A rehearing may be granted for material error in the findings.³⁸

An application for a rehearing of an order terminating an agreement for compensation must be made within the time provided by statute,³⁹ and an application for a rehearing of such an order, if dismissed without prejudice to the bringing of another application, does not serve to extend the time within which a further application may be made.⁴⁰

It is not necessary that an instrument be designated a request for a rehearing in order that it be considered as such.⁴¹

§ 910. Review

In a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, a final order is generally subject to appellate review, providing the required steps are taken, and the review is usually one of law with no re-examination of the facts except to determine whether the findings of fact are supported by legal evidence.

In a proceeding brought to review an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, an order which is final in character is subject to review on appeal,⁴² provided the right of appeal exists.⁴³ Such an order may be considered to be an award, and appealable as such.⁴⁴

In a proceeding of this nature, if an appealable order is entered from which no appeal is prosecuted, the order becomes a conclusive determination,⁴⁵ and the failure to appeal or otherwise obtain review may constitute a waiver of the right to review,⁴⁶ and be tantamount to an acquiescence in the order,⁴⁷ unless a rehearing is sought, as discussed supra § 909. After an agreement for compensation has been terminated by a proper order from which no timely appeal is prosecuted, there is no agreement to be reviewed on petition to review.⁴⁸ Ordinarily, if an appealable order is entered and no appeal is prosecuted, the order will not be subject to review on appeal from a subsequent judgment.⁴⁹

In a proceeding brought to modify, terminate, or reinstate an agreement for compensation because of a change in the condition of the employee, when an appealable order has been entered and the required procedure followed to obtain an appellate review, the review is usually solely one of law;⁵⁰ and,

Order of postponement

Where industrial accident board found that claimant's disability had increased since time of compensation agreement, an order of continuance postponing award until his condition was fixed, definite, and determinable was appealable as a final order.

Idaho.—McCall v. Potlatch Forests, 182 P.2d 156, 67 Idaho 415.

Order or decree fixing compensation

Last unappealed order or decree which has been entered after a hearing on a petition for review of any prior agreement, order, or decree fixing compensation is, regardless of its form or contents, a new fixing of compensation to which any petition for review thereafter filed should be directed.

R.I.—Ottone v. Franklin Process Co., 71 A.2d 780, 76 R.I. 431.

Erroneous reason for award

Where an agreement was entered into for compensation and a proceeding brought for additional compensation and it was allowed on ground of fraud, additional award would be permitted to stand even though evidence would not support the ground of fraud where evidence showed a change in condition of employee sufficient to warrant award of additional compensation.

Ky.—Department of Highways v. Tarter, 276 S.W.2d 687.

Appealable order

Fact that industrial commission had once taken jurisdiction of claim and made an award is not conclusive on question of jurisdiction, so as to make an order denying further award appealable.

43. No appeal permitted from decrees

Where an agreement for compensation had been presented to court and a decree entered thereon under which compensation was to be continued, no appeal would lie under statutory provision expressly prohibiting appeals from decrees entered on compensation agreements.

Appeal from subsequent order

An employee not appealing from order of joint board of department of labor and industries, denying his application to reopen earlier compensation claim, could not, on his appeal from order rejecting claim for later injury, be awarded additional compensation which he was entitled to receive on lump sum settlement of earlier claim.

Wash.—Sorenson v. Department of Labor and Industries, 121 P.2d 973, 12 Wash.2d 355.

50. R.I.—Flore v. Wanskuck Co., 116 A.2d 186.

as a general rule, questions of fact are determined by the compensation tribunal, and not by the court on review.⁵¹ After a determination of the facts by the proper compensation tribunal there may be no further inquiry into the facts by any other tribunal, except for fraud.⁵² If the appeal is prosecuted from an order of a referee to the compensation board or commission, that tribunal may have the power to substitute its own findings of fact for those made by the referee,⁵³ but when the appeal is prosecuted from an order or decision of the compensation board or commission to the courts, the courts may not have the same power of substitution.⁵⁴

On appellate review it is not for the reviewing court to pass on the weight of the evidence or the credibility of witnesses,⁵⁵ and the reviewing court may not weigh the evidence and decide for itself whether the decree is supported by a fair preponderance of the evidence.⁵⁶ Generally, the only question presented on appellate review is whether there was competent and substantial evidence to justify the findings of fact which were made by the compensation tribunal,⁵⁷ and whether there was substantial competent evidence to support findings of fact is a question of law for the reviewing court.⁵⁸ Thus, the appellate court will examine the transcript only to determine if there is any legal evidence to support the decree appealed from,⁵⁹ since the absence of legal evidence to support the decree constitutes an error of law.⁶⁰

Findings of fact which are supported by legally sufficient evidence are conclusive and binding,⁶¹ and will not be reviewed, set aside, or disturbed by the reviewing court on appeal,⁶² in the absence of fraud,⁶³ and an order based on findings of fact which are supported by competent and substantial evidence will not be disturbed by the reviewing court.⁶⁴ On the other hand, a finding is unauthorized where there is insufficient evidence to support it,⁶⁵ and is erroneous as a matter of law,⁶⁶ and an award or order based on such finding will be reversed or set aside.⁶⁷

In a proceeding to modify, terminate, or reinstate an agreement for compensation, where the triers of the facts refuse to find facts in favor of the party having the burden of proof, the question on review is not whether competent evidence would sustain such a finding if made, but whether there was a capricious disregard of competent evidence in the refusal so to find;⁶⁸ and on appeal from an order of a compensation board or commission where it has been held that the party who had the burden of proof did not meet that burden, the question is whether the findings of fact of the board or commission are consistent with each other and with its conclusion of law and its order, and can be sustained without capricious disregard of the competent evidence.⁶⁹ Thus, the failure of the referee or compensation board or commission to consider uncontradicted evidence, and to make findings in accordance therewith may constitute reversible error.⁷⁰

A finding of a compensation tribunal on a mixed question of law and fact may be reviewed on appeal,⁷¹ and whether the law has been correctly applied to the facts as found is solely a question of law to be determined on appeal.⁷² Where it is contended that a change should be made in the order of the referee and compensation board or commission, the burden on appeal to show that such change should be made is on the party so contending.⁷³

Where an award of compensation in addition to that provided for by agreement could be construed as based on a change in the condition of the employee and thus be a valid award, or could be construed as not based on a change in the condition of the employee and thus be an invalid award, on appeal the reviewing court would adopt the construction which would validate the award.⁷⁴

A question not raised in the proceeding before the board or commission will not be considered for the first time by the reviewing court,⁷⁵ and the reviewing court need not consider a question not urged or argued.⁷⁶ The failure to plead an affirmative defense and join issue thereon may preclude raising such defense on review.⁷⁷ Furthermore, on appeal from a decree entered in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation, the appellate court has no authority or power to add to the agreement which was made by the parties and approved as required by law,⁷⁸ and the agreement is final to the extent of the facts therein agreed on,⁷⁹ and the tribunal below may likewise be bound by the agreement as made and approved.⁸⁰ On appeal by an employer from an order of an industrial board denying its petition to set aside an approved compensation agreement on the grounds of mistake and noncompliance with statute, and ordering a resumption of compensation payments, it has been held that the employer's attempt to procure a decision on the board's power to order resumption of payments is premature when raised on such appeal.⁸¹

An appeal usually must be taken within the time prescribed,⁸² and an appeal will be denied when taken too late.⁸³ An extension of time in which to perfect an appeal may be granted if good cause for the extension of time exists.⁸⁴ A refusal to extend the time within which an appeal may be perfected may constitute an abuse of discretion, particularly where a justiciable question is shown to exist.⁸⁵

In order to raise and preserve for review a question as to the admissibility of evidence, one objection may be sufficient without the necessity of thereafter repeating the objection to each question which is designed to elicit similar testimony.⁸⁶ A party to a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation, having consented to the admission in evidence of a physician's report, cannot thereafter on review have the report ruled out of evidence because it allegedly is in conflict with a rule governing the admissibility of evidence.⁸⁷

If a proceeding for review of an agreement for compensation is heard originally by a single member of the compensation tribunal, it may not be required under the provisions of the compensation act that there be a further hearing by the full compensation tribunal before an appeal may be prosecuted to the courts.⁸⁸ Where a petition for reinstatement of an agreement for compensation is decided adversely to the employee, and from this decision an appeal is taken but prior to action being taken on the appeal by the court the appeal is discontinued without prejudice, such action does not preclude the employee from presenting another petition for reinstatement.⁸⁹

On certiorari to review the order of a board or commission denying claimant's application for relief from an agreement and for additional compensation, the only question involved is whether the inferior tribunal had jurisdiction to perform the act complained of,⁹⁰ and if the commission's order is valid on any ground, it is not subject to attack by certiorari.⁹¹

Disposition. An order which is subject to review may be reversed if erroneous,⁹² and may be reversed with directions to the tribunal below.⁹³

If an appeal is prosecuted from an order or determination of the compensation board or commission, the court may return the record to the board or commission for such further action as may be required,⁹⁴ as for further or more specific findings of fact,⁹⁵ and, if a judgment has been entered, on review the judgment may be modified and affirmed.⁹⁶ A finding of fact contained in a decree entered in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation may be stricken from the decree where the finding is not within the scope of the review.⁹⁷

Ordinarily, an order or decision of a compensation board or commission will not be reversed by the courts where the matter in issue is one peculiarly for the compensation authorities to determine,⁹⁸ and an order or decision will not be reversed if no error is shown.⁹⁹ Although it may be required by statute that findings of fact be set forth in the decree that is entered in a proceeding to review an agreement for compensation, where neither party on appeal objected to the form of a decree, and argued the case as though the decree contained the required findings of fact, under such circumstances the reviewing court would not remand the cause for the entry of a proper decree, but would treat the decree as though it had been properly amended.¹

§ 911. Reinstatement of Agreement

If payment of compensation has been under an agreement, and the agreement has terminated, or been suspending, a change in the condition of the employee may be ground for a reinstatement of the agreement.

It is stated supra § 896, that after an agreement for the payment of compensation has been made and approved, a change in the physical condition of the employee may warrant the suspension of the compensation payments; but a further change in the physical condition of the employee after the suspension of the payments may be sufficient to warrant the reinstatement of the agreement, and to require the resumption of the payments.² A compensation board may grant a petition for reinstatement of a compensation agreement after it has previously denied petitions for review and modification of its order suspending payments of compensation.³

A review and reinstatement of an agreement for compensation cannot be had under a compensation act provision relating to review, modification, or the setting aside of an agreement for compensation because of fraud, coercion, improper conduct, or fraud,⁴ and an erroneous opinion as to future changes in the condition of an employee does not constitute such a mistake of fact as to justify the setting aside of an agreement for compensation, as stated supra § 410; but a present disability as a consequence of later developments or physical degeneration resulting from the injury may be presented as a cause for reviewing and reinstating the agreement,⁵ provided the review and reinstatement is applied for within the time limited by statute, as discussed supra § 904.

Confusion in proceedings

Where employer's petition to terminate disability payments to employee under open agreement did not comply with statutory requirements and entire proceedings became so confused that burden of proof, which never shifted from employer and was never met by it, was transferred to employee, order of termination was vacated and record returned to workmen's compensation board to afford employer opportunity to comply with statutory provisions and to file a new petition.

In order that an agreement for compensation be subject to reinstatement it is usually necessary that it have been approved by the board or commission,⁶ and any approved formal agreement for compensation, whether original or supplemental, may be reinstated,⁷ and the agreement may be in existence, or it may have been suspended or terminated.⁸ A petition for reinstatement of a compensation agreement is barred if not filed within the period provided by statute.⁹ Where an employee has been awarded compensation, payments have been made for a period of time, and an agreement is then entered into suspending further payments, such agreement does not constitute a bar to a recovery of further compensation if it is found that the employee is permanently disabled,¹⁰ and a remedy may be available to obtain such further compensation without the necessity of first having set aside the agreement suspending payments.¹¹

§ 912. Waiver of Payments under Agreement

An employee does not voluntarily relinquish the right to further payments of compensation under an agreement by failing to reply to an inquiry of the compensation authorities with respect to his satisfaction with payments made.

An employee's failure to reply to an inquiry of the compensation commission with respect to whether he is satisfied with payments already made under an approved agreement, or desires a hearing as to termination thereof, is not equivalent to a voluntary relinquishment of the right to further payments.¹²

XXII. OFFENSES AND PENALTIES

§ 913. Offenses and Responsibility Therefor

Compensation acts providing for the imposition of penalties for violation of various provisions of the act, as, for failure to file required reports, or for failure to provide compensation insurance, are usually strictly construed in favor of the accused person.

A person who violates, or who intends to violate, a provision of a workmen's compensation act may thereby be subject to a criminal penalty, and if provision is made for such a penalty, it may be the only penalty that will be imposed.¹³ On the other hand, under a statute providing that an employer's failure to secure the payment of compensation shall constitute a misdemeanor and have the effect of enabling the injured employee or his representatives to maintain an action for damages, the punishment for such misdemeanor is not limited to enabling the employee or representatives to sue for damages;¹⁴ but in addition the offending employer may be punished by fine or imprisonment as provided in general penal laws relating to punishment for misdemeanors when not fixed by statute.¹⁵ If an injury to an employee is caused by an employer's violation of a safety order, such violation may result in a penalty being imposed as well as an increase in the amount of compensation that will be paid;¹⁶ but the fact that a violation of a safety order may result in a penalty as well as increased compensation does not mean that the two things are identical, and the fact that a violation of a safety order may result in a penalty as well as increased compensation shows a statutory distinction between the two results.¹⁷

Compensation acts frequently require that an injury or accident to an employee be reported by the employer, as stated infra § 915, and the failure of an employer to make a report within the time prescribed may result in the imposition of such penalty as is provided by law.¹⁸ A provision that a claimant must be penalized one day's compensation for each day's failure to report an accident to the employer must be enforced.¹⁹

Ordinarily, provisions providing penalties against employers will be strictly construed,²⁰ and, in strictly construing a compensation act, it has been held that a provision providing for a penalty for failure to obtain insurance does not apply to a municipality.²¹ Where a penalty may be imposed for an employer's failure to insure his liability under the act or to furnish proof of ability to pay compensation, a penalty may be imposed even though it is not found that the employer wilfully neglected to comply with the requirement.²² A statute making it an offense for an employer to fail to pay compensation to an employee in accordance with the terms of an award does not make it an offense for an employer to fail to pay death benefits to an employee's dependents.²³

If a member of a partnership cannot be an employee thereof for the purposes of workmen's compensation, a penal provision may not be enforced for failure to provide insurance for partners;²⁴ and, although a court will not lend its aid to a plan designed to evade provisions of a compensation act for the violation of which a penalty is prescribed,²⁵ such as a scheme whereby an employer attempts to evade requirements of insurance by creating a partnership,²⁶ such a plan may be executed to the degree that a partnership is in fact established, and if this is done no penalty may be imposed for failure to provide insurance, even though the plan was admittedly conceived and executed for the purpose of evading insurance requirements.²⁷ In determining whether a workman was an independent contractor or an employee for the purpose of ascertaining whether a criminal penalty should be imposed for failure to provide compensation insurance, the same tests will be applied as are used in determining such status for other purposes.²⁸

The failure of an employer to keep his employees insured in accordance with compensation act requirements may be a continuing offense, similar to a husband's neglect to support his wife;²⁹ and the duty to secure the payment of compensation arises as soon as a person becomes an employer and continues while that status exists, and if a person fails to perform that duty, either when he first becomes an employer, or at any time thereafter while such status continues, he may be guilty of a misdemeanor, entirely regardless of the occurrence of injury to any employee or the making of an award therefor.³⁰

Where a public employee sustains an injury for which a lump sum payment is made under workmen's compensation law, and the employee retires and seeks the benefits provided by a retirement law, a provision in that law that an employee is not entitled to retirement benefits until the amount which would be paid exceeds the amount of a lump sum settlement of a compensation claim does not constitute a violation of a statutory provision prohibiting an employer from exacting from an employee any part of the cost of workmen's compensation.³¹

Filing statement as to persons employed. Under statutes requiring an employer entitled to the benefits of the act, and who has not elected to reject such benefits, to file with the commission annually on or before a specified date, a duplicate verified statement showing the number of his employees who would be entitled to the benefits of the act, the total wages paid such employees during the previous fiscal year, and any other information required as to wages, and making failure to file the statement a misdemeanor, and providing that the statute shall not apply to any employer regularly employing less than a stated number of employees, in counting the number of employees boys are included,³² and an employer is within the requirements of the act if the number of employees in all departments totals the number specified by statute although the number in any single department may be less.³³

An employer cannot violate an order of a commission prior to the effective date thereof,³⁴ and a penalty based on such an alleged violation is unenforceable.³⁵ An employer may not be penalized under one section of a workmen's compensation act for an offense committed under a different and distinct section carrying its own penalties for violation.³⁶ Where a compensation act has been amended and reenacted with a provision in the act that nothing in the act should affect or impair any right of action which shall have accrued before the act shall take effect, such provision, being applicable only to civil right of action, does not operate to permit a criminal prosecution under the prior provisions.³⁷

Who may sue for penalty. Under general statutes requiring actions to be brought by the real party in interest, and subsequently enacted provisions of a workmen's compensation law expressly authorizing a board or commission to sue for penalties, it has been held that a suit may be brought against an employer, for penalties for failure to make required reports of injuries, by either the board³⁸ or the state as the real party in interest.³⁹

Venue. Under statutes making it a misdemeanor for an employer to refuse or neglect to "make" a report of injuries sustained by an employee and to "mail" it to the industrial board, the offense of such neglect or failure is completed in the county of the employer's place of business,⁴⁰ so that the venue of an action to collect a fine for such offense lies in the county wherein the employer's place of business is situated;⁴¹ although under a statutory provision punishing a failure to "file" with the board evidence of a compliance with certain provisions of the act, the neglect is punishable in the county wherein the filing should have been done, which is the county wherein the board has its offices.⁴²

Hearing. The assessment of a penalty for violation of a compensation act provision, if done without first affording the penalized person an opportunity to be heard, is erroneous.⁴³

§ 914. Enforcement

If an employer is convicted of violating provisions of a workmen's compensation act, the sentence imposed should be commensurate with the gravity of the offense.

The prosecution of an employer for violation of provisions of compensation law may be by information,⁴⁴ and, on conviction of an employer, the sentence imposed should be commensurate with the gravity of the offense.⁴⁵ Where an employer is convicted and a fine imposed under a statute which, in addition to creating the offense, provides for the remission of such fine as may be imposed if defendant complies with certain requirements, the fine may be suspended under a general statute, even though defendant has not complied with the requirements that would authorize the remission of the fine.⁴⁶

A lien filed to secure payment of a penalty assessed has the legal effect of a lis pendens.⁵⁰

In a proceeding brought for the collection of a penalty, an order assessing the penalty is an ap-

XXIII. EMPLOYER'S REPORT OF ACCIDENT AND NOTICE OF DEATH TO BENEFICIARIES

§ 915. Report of Accidents

Compensation acts frequently require the employer to report an injury or accident to an employee, but it is not always necessary that trivial accidents or injuries be reported.

Workmen's compensation act provisions, or rules and regulations of compensation boards or commissions, may require that a report be made by an employer when an accident occurs which results in the injury or death of an employee,⁵⁴ and it has been held that such provisions should be liberally construed.⁵⁵ Where certain provisions of the compensation act require employers to keep a record of all "injuries" sustained by their employees in the course of their employment and to make certain reports of such injuries, while other provisions denominate the reports to be those of "accidents," the latter term is used in the sense of something undesigned, unforeseen, or unexpected.⁵⁶ The failure of an employer to make a report with the time prescribed may result in the imposition of such penalty as is provided by law, as discussed supra § 913, and may result in the employer being precluded from setting up a statute of limitations as a bar to a proceeding for compensation, supra § 441, or as a bar to a claim for compensation, supra § 475.

Compensation acts, or regulations made pursuant thereto, usually do not require the reporting of every injury or accident,⁵⁷ and an accident may be so trivial that the employer is justified in believing that it need not be reported.⁵⁸ Under some compensation acts it is necessary to report only such accidents as result in compensable injuries,⁵⁹ or such accidents as arise out of, and in the course of, employment and result in loss of life or injury.⁶⁰ A requirement that employers shall, within a stated period of time, report all on-the-job deaths of employees is mandatory,⁶¹ and a report on an employee's death on the job must be reported even though the employer may believe that the death is not compensable.⁶²

A compensation act may require that a report of a noncompensable accident shall be made when an employee is injured so slightly that he loses little or no time from work, and also require that a report of a compensable accident shall be made when an employee sustains an injury which causes the loss of a specified period of time from work.⁶³ Under such a provision a report of a compensable accident is required as a matter of law when an injury causes an employee to be absent from work for the specified period of time.⁶⁴ However, an accident which does not result in any immediate disability need not be reported as compensable merely because there is a possibility that the employee will be prevented in the future from performing the work in which he was engaged at the time the accident occurred.⁶⁵ An employer who knows that an employee's injury is disabling in character must file a proper report.⁶⁶ An injury may be compensable and be reported as such although it does not cause the employee to lose time from work,⁶⁷ and an employer who reports an injury as noncompensable although he has full knowledge that the injury is in fact compensable has not complied with the requirements of the act;⁶⁸ but if an employer does not have knowledge that an accident is compensable, a report of the accident as noncompensable will constitute compliance with the requirement of a report.⁶⁹ In order that an employer be under the duty of reporting an accident, injury, or occupational disease, it is necessary that the employer have notice or knowledge that the accident or injury has occurred, or that the occupational disease exists.⁷⁰

Where a statute requires that reports be on forms furnished by the board or commission, the forms should provide for such definite statements of fact as are necessary to obtain the required information,⁷¹ and a report which is not on a prescribed form may be ineffective as a report.⁷² Where the method of transmitting the report to the compensation bureau for filing is prescribed by the compensation act, compliance with the designated method is compliance with the act.⁷³

Under a compensation act providing for reports of noncompensable injuries and compensable injuries, a report of a noncompensable injury should describe the injury with such particularity of location and effect as to indicate the nature of the injury, and identify it;⁷⁴ but it is not necessary that the employer ascertain and set up all the effects of the injury, or to anticipate future developments.⁷⁵ An employer reporting to the compensation authorities and denying liability need not notify the employee to this effect.⁷⁶

A person who is an employer within the meaning of workmen's compensation law may be considered to be an employer for the purpose of making such report as is required by the compensation act.⁷⁷ The fact that an employer has rejected the act does not excuse him, under some statutes, from making the required reports of injuries to employees.⁷⁸

An employer's report of an accident or injury may constitute prima facie evidence that the accident and injury were as reported,⁷⁹ and a report of an accident and injury may constitute an admission of liability.⁸⁰ A report may not constitute an admission of liability,⁸¹ and may negative any admission of liability.⁸² Furthermore, an employer in reporting an accident and injury may waive any question as to the nature of an injury and give an unqualified answer.⁸³

§ 916. Notice of Death to Beneficiaries

If an employee has furnished his employer or the representative of the employer with a statement of persons who will be beneficiaries if the employee dies, and thereafter the employee does die in the course of employment, the employer may be required to give the beneficiaries notice that the employee has died.

Where a compensation act provides for employees furnishing their employers with a statement of the persons who would be beneficiaries under compensation law in the event of the death of the employee, and further provides that when such a statement has been given the employer shall, in the event of the death of the employee, notify beneficiaries of the death, a statement by an employee given to one acting as employment agent for several employers is sufficient to require one of such employers to give notice to such employee's beneficiaries.⁸⁴

XXIV. EFFECT OF ACT ON OTHER STATUTORY OR COMMON-LAW RIGHTS OF ACTION AND DEFENSES

A. IN GENERAL

§ 917. General Statement

Except as the statute otherwise provides, the general rule is that wherever the compensation laws are applicable, the rights and remedies provided thereby are exclusive.

The extent to which a workmen's compensation act deprives the employer or the employee of his causes of action or defenses depends primarily on the language of the act itself,⁸⁵ which, by act of the parties accepting the act, becomes a part of the contract of service.⁸⁶ An existing common-law right of action is not taken away except by direct enactment or necessary implication;⁸⁷ but the general rule is that wherever the compensation laws are applicable, the rights and remedies granted or provided thereby are exclusive,⁸⁸ with such excep-

Common liability of employer with third party

(1) Compensation act extinguished liability of employer to employee for negligence of employer, and consequently there can be no common liability of such employer with third party for their joint negligence.

N.J.—Yearicks v. City of Wildwood, 92 A.2d 873, 23 N.J.Super. 379.

Effect on proceedings in another state

(1) Illinois compensation act abolished right of action against employer under Illinois common law or Illinois Personal Injuries Act, in situations to which compensation act applies, and to that extent such act provides an exclusive remedy, but act was not designed to preclude any recovery by proceedings brought in another state for injuries received there in course of Illinois employment.

(2) Supreme court should not readily interpret Illinois compensation act so as to cut off employee's right to sue under other legislation passed for his benefit, and only some unmistakable language by state legislature or judiciary would warrant accepting by court of such construction, especially where rights affected were those arising under legislation of another state and where full faith and credit clause was brought into play. "An injured workman entitled to compensation under . . . [the compensation act] has no right of action against anyone for his injuries except as that right is expressly preserved or created by that act, for it was the intention of the Workmen's Compensation Act to withdraw such causes of action from private controversy."

Rights of action preserved or created

Under compensation act, all civil causes of action for personal injuries sustained in an industrial accident arising out of extrahazardous employment are abolished except in those cases where act expressly preserves or creates a right of action, and in such cases rights of action are purely statutory, and not common-law, rights.

Wash.—Boeing Aircraft Co. v. Department of Labor and Industries, 156 P.2d 640, 22 Wash.2d 423.

Hazardous or extra-hazardous work

(1) Industrial Insurance Act of Washington has application only to common-law system governing remedy of workmen against employers for injuries received in hazardous work. U.S.—Muir v. Kessinger, D.C.Wash., 35 F.Supp. 116, cause remanded on other grounds, C.C.A., 121 F.2d 456.

(2) One engaged in extra-hazardous employment has only such right of action as is specifically afforded by compensation act, and such right of action is not a common-law right of action, but is a purely statutory right of action.

Wash.—Koreski v. Seattle Hardware Co., 135 P.2d 860, 17 Wash.2d 421.

(3) There does not exist, by reason of legislative declaration of public policy, a right of action for an injury sustained in an industrial accident arising out of an extra-hazardous employment, except in those cases where compensation act expressly preserves or creates a right of action, and all jurisdiction of courts of state of such causes of action has been abolished.

extinguishing any further claim of the injured person for his injuries,⁹⁰ even though actually inadequate and substantially less than a claimant would be likely to receive by the verdict of a jury.⁹¹

So, a compensation act has been held not cumulative⁹² or supplementary⁹³ in character, but is substitutional,⁹⁴ displaces the common-law liability for negligence,⁹⁵ as far as the act provides a remedy,⁹⁶ and is a complete and exclusive code of laws on its subject,⁹⁷ governing all questions of substantive rights under its terms;⁹⁸ it is complete and exclusive not only as to relief for injuries within its purview, but as to procedures to be followed.⁹⁹

If a person has an action against a defendant under the compensation act, he cannot also have his action against the defendant under the common law;¹ any rights which a plaintiff might have had at common law have been supplanted and superseded by the act, if applicable.²

Only the facts and circumstances of the injury can determine whether it is compensable and, therefore, whether the employee's remedy is exclusively under the compensation law.³ A provision of the compensation law that the statutory liability for injury or death shall be exclusive and in place of any other liability "on account of such injury or death" does not mean that the right to compensation in the event of certain injuries shall be exclusive and in place of liability for other injuries.⁴

A person who is not an employee at all is not limited to remedies under the compensation act, but may enforce other appropriate remedies against the person liable.⁵ So, an independent contractor is not an employee within the act, and may sue for damages.⁶ A volunteer who substitutes for a regular employee at the latter's request, although not an employee entitled to compensation within the meaning of the compensation act in the absence of the employer's consent, express or implied, may found his right of recovery for injuries received on the general principles of negligence, and, where an award under the act is made on that basis, it will not be disturbed;⁷ and, so, an applicant for employment who thought he had been employed notwithstanding his testimony showed that no contract of employment had been completed may recover damages for injuries resulting from defendant's negligence while on his premises.⁸

Liability of highway department for tort. A statute making the state subject to the workmen's compensation law does not change the method of bringing actions against the state highway department for a tort⁹ or otherwise affect its liability therefor.¹⁰

Conflict with Declaratory Judgments Act. Since the workmen's compensation laws are specific, and the Declaratory Judgments Act is general, the former must prevail in the event of a conflict.¹¹

B. BETWEEN EMPLOYEE AND EMPLOYER

1. EXCLUSIVENESS OF REMEDIES AFFORDED BY ACTS

§ 918. In General

- a. General rules
- b. Federal acts
- c. Municipal pensions or compensation
- d. Failure to furnish, or negligence in furnishing, medical treatment

a. General Rules

The general rule is that, as between employer and employee, the rights and remedies provided in the compensation acts are exclusive, within the area of their operation; so, unless a statute provides otherwise, an employee whose claim is within the act cannot maintain an action against his employer for damages.

Unless the statute otherwise provides,¹² the gen-

U.S.—U. S. Steel Corp. v. Emerson-Comstock Co., D.C.Ill., 141 F.Supp. 143.

Shield against civil liability

An award of workmen's compensation shields employer from civil liability in action at law.

Idaho.—Devlin v. Ennis, 292 P.2d 469, 77 Idaho 342.

Possible election between employer and third party

Where employer is liable under compensation act, act must furnish exclusive remedy as to him, regardless of fact that, if a third party were also liable, employee might have option to elect whether to proceed against him or third party.

U.S.—Peski v. Todd & Brown, C.C.A. Ind., 158 F.2d 59.

Effect of provision as to penalties

Provision of compensation act that nothing therein shall be construed to relieve any employer or employee from any penalty for failure to perform any statutory duty applies solely to penalties and does not provide any greater remedy to employee by limiting or qualifying provision that remedy given by act excludes all other remedies.

Ga.—Reid v. Lummus Cotton Gin Co., 197 S.E. 904, 58 Ga.App. 184.

Expenses of compensation litigation

An employee failing to present claim for expenses of compensation litigation, resulting in a favorable award which was paid by insurance carrier, could not maintain a common-law action against employer for such expenses, notwithstanding employer was stubbornly litigious.

Ga.—Patterson v. Curtis Pub. Co., 198 S.E. 102, 58 Ga.App. 211.

Employer's breach of agreement

Employee held not entitled to recover from employer for breach of agreement to provide for compensation or employment because of employee's forbearance to assert his right to compensation within time within which he was permitted by law to present his claim for injuries before industrial commission.

Ill.—Wright v. Peabody Coal Co., 8 N.E.2d 68, 290 Ill.App. 110.

Absence of contract

In injuries suffered by employee which occurred in course of employment, sole recovery, in absence of contract, would be under compensation act.

N.J.—Lake v. Rosenberg, 34 A.2d 224, 131 N.J.Law 19.

Occupational Disease Act

Ceccarelli v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., Com.Pl., 90 Pittsb.Leg. J. 304.

(2) Exclusive remedy provision of occupational disease act, which is closely allied to workmen's compensation act, is ambiguous and, from wording, susceptible of being interpreted in two different manners, thereby requiring court, in construing provision, to ascertain legislative intent.

Federal acts; interstate commerce

(1) If injured railroad employee was engaged in intrastate commerce and not interstate commerce at time of his injury, his sole remedy was under compensation act of state, and he could not recover under Federal Employers' Liability Act or Federal Safety Appliance Act.

Cal.—McCoy v. Southern Pac. Co., 83 P.2d 970, 29 C.A.2d 16, certiorari denied 59 S.Ct. 827, 307 U.S. 626, 83 L.Ed. 1510.

No choice as to suing or accepting compensation
Where an injury is compensable under industrial insurance act and injured workman accepts provisions of act, as by failing to file notice of rejection, he cannot choose as to whether he will sue at common law or accept compensation under act, and his exclusive remedy is under act.
Nev.—Pershing Quicksilver Co. v. Thiers, 152 P.2d 432, 62 Nev. 382.
Minor employee
(1) Exclusive remedy of a minor employee for injuries is under compensation act, in absence of notice to contrary.
Ariz.—Villapando v. Industrial Commission, 216 P.2d 397, 70 Ariz. 55.
(2) Common law with respect to a minor's capacity to contract and his sists only of medical and hospitalization benefits does not prevent the application of the principle.¹⁹

So, unless a statute provides otherwise,²⁰ an action governed by the law of master and servant cannot be maintained against an employer operating under the compensation act;²¹ and an employee whose claim is within the act cannot maintain an action at law, or at common law, in tort against his employer for damages,²² the common-law lia-ability to break his contract has been changed by compensation act making act exclusive remedy of minor employee not giving notice to contrary prior to injury.

Act authorizing suit against state

An act authorizing person injured by highway department's employee to file suit against state on his claim for damage permitted maintenance of tort action against state, notwithstanding fact that injured person was also an employee of department and that compensation act provides an exclusive remedy, legislature being empowered to change nature of remedy.

La.—Crain v. State, App., 23 So.2d 336.

Prospective application of statute

Provision of Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation Act that right of action of an injured employee for damages caused by injury, at common law or under any statute in force on named date, should not be affected by act, refers not only to injuries sustained before passage of act, but also to injuries sustained thereafter, and hence act does not destroy common law of master and servant.

N.H.—Dubuc v. Amoskeag Industries, 15 A.2d 867, 91 N.H. 173.

Liability of owner of motor vehicle

It was not legislative intent to vitiate compensation law provision, making remedy thereunder exclusive in case of injury by a fellow worker, when it enacted Vehicle and Traffic Law section making owner of motor vehicle liable for negligence of any person operating same on public highway with express or implied permission of owner.

N.Y.—Rauch v. Jones, 168 N.Y.S.2d 69, 4 A.D.2d 572.

Infant

(1) Under provision of compensation act that nothing therein shall deprive an infant of right or rights now existing to recover damages in a common-law or other appropriate action or proceeding for injuries received by reason of the negligence of his master, a minor injured in an accident arising out of, and in course of, employment had right to elect to seek remedy at law or under compensation act, but he could not do both.

N.J.—Goetaski v. California Packing Corp., 88 A.2d 685, 19 N.J.Super. 460.

(2) Right of infant to sue at law after election to take compensation under statute see infra § 937.

Substitute for previous actions

(1) Compensation act was intended, in general, as in nature of a substitute, between master and servant, who elect to come within its provisions, for actions of tort for personal injuries at common law and under other statutes.

Ala.—Gentry v. Swann Chemical Co., 174 So. 530, 234 Ala. 313.

(2) Compensation act was designed as a substitute for previous rights of action of employees against employers and to cover whole ground of liabilities of employer.

Employer acting jointly with third party

An insured employer is not liable for an industrial injury to his employees under general tort principles, but only by virtue of workmen's compensation provisions, and is subject to proceedings before industrial accident commission, but not to suit in court for injury; and this is so even though employer acted jointly with third party.

R. H. Macy & Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 156 F.2d 204.

Mutually exclusive remedies

A statutory proceeding for workmen's compensation and common-law liability for negligence of employer are mutually exclusive remedies, and former affords social insurance irrespective of fault for consequences of an industrial accident arising out of, and in course of, employment, while latter is a common-law mode of redressing personal injuries attributable to fault not within compensation act.

Express provision of statute

Compensation statute providing that employer shall not be liable to any action for damages because of personal injuries sustained by employee arising out of, and in course of, his employment eliminates common-law liability of employer to employee.

Ind.—Seaton v. U. S. Rubber Co., 61 N.E.2d 177, 223 Ind. 404.

Effect of absence of disability

Common-law remedy is unavailable to employee suffering injury or disease mentioned in compensation law, even though he sustained no disability.

firmative,²⁴ or complete,²⁵ defense to such an action. In such circumstances the courts have no jurisdiction to hear an action for damages,²⁶ and ity; so, employee contracting chrome poisoning, listed as occupational disease in compensation law, held not entitled to prosecute common-law action against employer for damages, although not yet disabled.

(1) In action for injuries to nurse in city hospital, city was not estopped to claim application of compensation law on ground that, when nurse filed claim with comptroller within statutory time, she was not then told to apply for compensation, and when she was examined and served her summons and complaint within two-year limit, city failed to move to dismiss.

Mental pain and suffering

An employee could not maintain a common-law action against city for injuries received growing out of, and in course of, employment, which injuries caused mental pain and suffering, notwithstanding injury was occasioned by negligence of city's agents, since board of workmen's compensation had exclusive jurisdiction, as against claim that board was without jurisdiction because compen-

the employee has no capacity to sue.²⁷

So, also, an action for fraud²⁸ or deceit²⁹ will not lie; likewise, an injury which is compensable under the compensation act will not support an action against the employer at law in contract.³⁰

The remedies provided by the compensation act are exclusive only where the employer-employee relationship exists,³¹ whether it does exist is deter-sation act does not provide for mental pain and suffering.

Ga.—Bartram v. City of Atlanta, 30 S.E.2d 780, 71 Ga.App. 313.

Effect of avoiding award

Employee, succeeding in avoiding final award of state industrial commission, made on joint petition, on ground of fraud, could not maintain common-law action for injuries, since powers of commission, interrupted by a voidable order, reattached and continued until a valid order was issued closing case.

Employer's failure to file employee's application

Where employer allegedly represented that it would file injured employee's application for compensation, but withheld application and paid employee twenty-two dollars and fifty cents a week for two years so as to lead employee to believe that his claim was being paid in accordance with compensation law, and then stopped payment after limitation period of two years had expired, employee could not maintain common-law action of deceit against employer who had complied with compensation law.

Va.—Fauver v. Bell, 65 S.E.2d 575, 192 Va. 518.

Doubt as to relationship; suit in alternative

Although statutory provision making employee's rights under compensation law exclusive is strictly enforced where employee or his dependents seek to circumvent its stringency by suing in tort, employee may sue for compensation and in alternative for damages under general statute, where there is doubt as to whether relationship of employer and employee exists.

La.—Jackson v. Southern Kraft Corp., App., 183 So. 135.

Admission of relationship

Where relationship of employer and employee is admitted, both are bound by compensation law, and employee's disability resulting from injury received in course of employment must be compensated, if at all, strictly in keeping therewith.

La.—Jackson v. Southern Kraft Corp., supra.

Severance of relation

(1) If relation of employer and employee was severed before fight occurred between employee and foreman, compensation law would not govern what occurred thereafter; whether an employee voluntarily quits his employment or is discharged by his employer, employee is entitled to reasonable time to leave premises of employer before it can be said that relation of employer and employee is so completely severed as to render compensation law inapplicable.

Mo.—Gardner v. Stout, 119 S.W.2d 790, 342 Mo. 1206.

(2) Relation held not severed before assault by foreman on employee, and, hence, employee could not maintain common-law action for damages against his employers.

Mo.—Gardner v. Stout, supra.

(3) Assault generally see infra § 926.

Employee's duties as part of employer's business

(1) Decisive factors in determining whether injured employee's duties are part of employer's business, so as to make compensation exclusive remedy for injuries sustained by employees of independent contractors, are nature of employee's work and nature of employer's business, and unless work is of such special or separate character as would not ordinarily or appropriately be performed by employer's own employees in prosecution of his business or as essential part thereof, it is part of employer's trade, business, or occupation.

U.S.—Isthmian S. S. Co. of Del. v. Olivieri, C.A.La., 202 F.2d 492.

(2) Taking of precautions to guard ship cargo is indispensable and usual part of trade, business, or occupation of every steamship line, and, therefore, watchman who was employed by corporation which had contracted to provide such protection, and who was injured when crates fell on him, was limited in his recovery by compensation statute.

U.S.—Isthmian S. S. Co. of Del. v. Olivieri, supra.

Employer as owner of premises

Regardless of his status as owner of premises where injury occurs, employer remains employer in his relations with his employees as to all matters arising from, and connected with, their employment, and may not be treated as dual legal personality in order to impose liability in addition to that assumed under compensation law.

N.Y.—Klein v. Pepe, 99 N.Y.S.2d 794.

Partner as employer

Fact that automobile driver was but one member of partnership which employed passenger would not prevent driver's absolution from any liability for injuries to passenger other than that under compensation law.

N.Y.—Klein v. Pepe, supra.

A compromise agreement entered into by painter and building company's insurer, which settled compensation case and was approved by industrial accident board, was not an mined as of the time of the injury, and not of the commencement of the action.³² It is the employer who, by virtue of the compensation statute, is exempt from the ordinary action or suit for negligence.³³

The rule that the compensation act is to be liberally construed in favor of its applicability is not altered by the fact that a plaintiff believes he can establish negligence and brings a civil suit for damages;³⁴ the act is to be liberally construed, so as to include all services that can reasonably be said to be within it, not only when the injured person seeks its protection, but when he attempts to have himself excluded from the coverage of the act.³⁵

A state compensation act, even though in terms exclusive, does not affect an employee's remedy in damages under a federal law which to that extent supersedes the state enactment;³⁶ and, where exclusiveness of remedy is conditioned on the existence of certain facts, the bringing of an action for damages is not barred in the first instance, but the nonexistence of facts on which exclusiveness of remedy is predicated must be set up as a defense, and proved.³⁷

The failure of physicians, employed full-time by the employer, to inform an employee of his rights under the compensation act has been held not such a breach of legal or statutory duty as to make the employer liable in damages for the loss of compensation benefits through failure to make a timely claim.³⁸

Stay of proceedings. Where a petition for a settlement under the compensation act, and an action at law for damages, both for the same cause of action, are pending, the proper practice is to stay the trial of the action for damages until a final determination on the petition.³⁹

Disposition of action wrongfully brought. Where, under the statute, an application under the compensation act waives the right to institute proceedings in any court, an action begun after such an application should be dismissed.⁴⁰ Although an action at law by an injured employee is erroneously brought, both parties being within the provisions of a compensation act, the court, in case it has jurisdiction of proceedings to obtain compensation, should not dismiss the action, but should retain it for the remedy to which plaintiff may prove his right;⁴¹ but, where in such case the action is over the objection permitted to proceed to trial and judgment, the judgment must be reversed and the court on appeal cannot treat the verdict as an award of compensation or direct a judgment for any amount on the record.⁴²

Purview of act

Cases are not within purview of compensation act providing that an employer, paying premiums or compensation provided by law, shall not be liable in damages at common law for injury to an employee unless it is made to appear that injured person was an employee of employer, or an employee of an independent contractor who carried no insurance, in which case act would apply if injuries were received under circumstances which would have made principal liable had employee been in his immediate employment.

b. Federal Acts

The Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act and the Federal Employees' Compensation Act have been held exclusive within the fields of their operation, so as to bar actions against their employers by employees whose claims come within either act.

Under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, 33 U.S.C.A. § 901 et seq., providing that the liability of an employer to his employee thereunder shall be exclusive, but that the act shall not apply to the injury or death of a master or member of the crew of any vessel, the exclusiveness of the employer's liability, where the act applies, has been judicially declared;⁴³ the obvious purpose of the provision is to make the statutory liability of an employer to contribute to his employee's compensation the exclusive liability of such employer to his employee, or to anyone claiming under or through such employee, because of his injury or death arising out of that employment.⁴⁴

Limitation of coverage

(1) Longshoremen's Compensation Act, by restricting compensation to injuries occurring on navigable waters, and by excluding from its own terms and from Jones Act any remedies against employer for injuries inflicted on shore, left stevedores injured on shore to pursue remedies afforded by local laws which permit recovery against employer for injuries inflicted by land torts on his employees who are not members of crew of a vessel.

(2) Matters not within scope of acts see infra §§ 918-930.

Merchant Marine Act superseded

Longshoremen's Act supersedes Merchant Marine Act, 46 U.S.C.A. § 688, authorizing recovery for injury to, or death of, seamen, with respect to longshoremen who are injured on navigable waters of United States. U.S.—Panama Agencies Co. v. Franco, C.C.A.Canal Zone, 111 F.2d 263.

Effect of Defense Bases Act

Exclusive nature of remedy afforded employees entitled to benefits of Longshoremen's Compensation Act was not changed by Defense Bases Act, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1651 et seq., extending benefits of Longshoremen's Compensation Act to defense base workers.

Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act.

U.S.—Job v. Erie R. Co., D.C.N.Y., 79 F.Supp. 698.

Effect of contract

(1) Where employer expressly agreed with employee to carry compensation insurance pursuant to Longshoremen's Compensation Act, as amended by Defense Bases Act, such acts became part of contract, and exclusive statutory remedy afforded thereunder for injured employees could not be defeated or extended by resort to a different and independent contract provision designed for another purpose and having no relation to workmen's compensation insurance.

Minn.—Huhn v. Foley Bros., 22 N.W. 2d 3, 221 Minn. 279.

(2) A stevedoring company, liable under contract to government for injury to stevedoring employee unloading a government ship because of company's fault in creating an unseaworthy place to work, is not relieved of liability under contract because of provision of Longshoremen's Compensation Act for exclusiveness of liability of employer for employee's injury, since act limits liability of employer to those entitled to damages from injury to, or death of, employee without any contract relationship to employer other than employment.

Expense of trip for medical treatment

(1) Where contract of employment

The act imposes an absolute, but limited, liability on the part of the employer to pay compensation and related benefits, which are exclusive and in place of all other liability of the employer.⁴⁵

Particular persons have been held to be within the coverage of the act, and, therefore, barred by the act from maintaining actions against their employers for injuries,⁴⁶ as where they were held not to be members of crews,⁴⁷ while others have been held to be members of crews, and therefore not to expressly obligated employers to carry compensation insurance pursuant to Longshoremen's Compensation Act, as amended by Defense Bases Acts, employee injured in Alaska, being entitled to travel expense necessary to obtain medical treatment as part of compensation award, could not sue employers for expense of return trip to St. Paul under another provision of contract requiring employers to provide free return transportation if employee remained on job nine months on theory that, although he did not remain nine months, return was not voluntary, but necessary to obtain medical treatment.

Minn.—Huhn v. Foley Bros., 22 N.W. 2d 8, 221 Minn. 279.

(2) Municipal court of St. Paul had no jurisdiction over subject matter of action against employers by employee injured in Alaska to recover expense of trip to St. Paul for medical treatment, where employee was entitled to benefits of Longshoremen's Compensation Act, since his remedy under Compensation Act was exclusive.

Enlargement of longshoreman's rights

Prior to Longshoremen's Compensation Act, longshoreman had a possible right of action against vessel on which he was injured, against his immediate employer, or against any one else claimed to be responsible for injuring him, and change in law was not intended to reduce his rights, but to enlarge them.

c. Municipal Pensions or Compensation

The right of a municipal employee to workmen's compensation or a pension, or to both, has been variously determined in accordance with the language of the compensation act and of the charter or other statute governing the municipality.

A state compensation law binds cities as employers within its terms with respect to city officers and employees injured in the city's service,⁶¹ superseding similar provisions in the city charter,⁶² unless the act in express terms excludes city employees from its benefits when, and as long as, provision for them is made in the city charter,⁶³ or unless the charter has been framed by the city independently of the legislature under a provision of the state constitution and is interpreted to entitle the injured employee to a pension independently of his right to compensation,⁶⁴ or unless the charter in terms supplements the act, entitling the employee or his dependents to a pension after compensation under the act ceases.⁶⁵ In the latter case, payment of compensation under the act,⁶⁶ or waiver by the employee of his right thereto,⁶⁷ is a condition precedent to a pension under the charter.

Under governing statutes or charter provisions, the award or acceptance of compensation may not bar the right to a pension,⁶⁸ but the contrary rul-

Fireman

(1) A member of city fire department who became totally and permanently disabled in course of his employment was entitled to receive benefits of compensation act and of Firemen's Pension Act, and it was immaterial under which act he first accepted benefits, as against contention that such recovery allowed him double protection and double compensation for same injury.

ing has also been made,⁶⁹ and under a provision of the compensation act that injured policemen or firemen, or their dependents, are not entitled to both the benefits provided by the act and "like benefits" provided by municipal charter, the quoted phrase does not mean benefits coextensive in every detail, or identical, but benefits similar in salient features.⁷⁰

Where the act excludes city employees who have pension rights under the charter from compensation under the act,⁷¹ or where the charter supplements the act, giving the employee an election between compensation under the act and pension under the charter,⁷² the employee is not entitled to elect between compensation or pension, on the one hand, and a right to sue for damages, on the other. A statute requiring a city employee to elect between workmen's compensation and a pension does not deprive the legislature of its power, after an election to take compensation has been made, to recognize long and faithful service by a pension in contravention of the policy of the statute.⁷³

Credit of compensation payments against pension.

A city is not entitled to credit against the pension due an employee any payments made to him under the workmen's compensation act;⁷⁴ the employee is entitled to his entire pension without set-off or deduction.⁷⁵

d. Failure to Furnish, or Negligence in Furnishing, Medical Treatment

Authorities differ as to whether an injured employee having a remedy under the compensation act may sue his employer, or the latter's insurer, for negligence in connection with the medical or surgical treatment of the employee.

Where an employer, in addition to subscribing to the workmen's compensation act, makes a separate contract with employees to furnish medical treatment for illness or injuries in consideration of deductions from wages, the remedies under act and contract are cumulative, and the employer's liability on the contract is not affected by the act;⁷⁶ but, where an employee's only right to be furnished medical treatment by his employer is his right to recover therefor in a proceeding before the compensation commission, he may not sue to recover damages for the employer's breach of statutory duty to furnish the treatment, as discussed infra § 936.

Particular evidence has been held to establish the fact that the employer did not refuse to provide medical treatment, so as to be estopped to invoke the defense, to an action for injuries, that the employee was within the compensation act.⁷⁷ The only effect of an employer's failure to provide medical treatment for the injured employee, and his denial of liability therefor, is to authorize the employee to employ a physician of his own choosing and recover the expense of medical treatment in the proceeding before the compensation commission.⁷⁸

78. Mo.—Klasing v. Fred Schmitt Contracting Co., supra.

An injured employee cannot maintain an action against his employer's compensation insurer on the theory that it is guilty of negligence or breach of contract in causing a delay in the hospitalization of the employee through failure to guarantee hospital expenses.⁷⁹

The great weight of authority has been held to be to the effect that an employee may not recover from his employer, or the latter's insurance carrier, damages for aggravation of his injury resulting from the negligence of a physician in examination or treatment performed as prescribed by the workmen's compensation act;⁸⁰ such malpractice is regarded as constituting a natural consequence of the primary injury,⁸¹ and the compensation act affords the exclusive remedy for the compensable aggravation of an injury by a physician, as far as the liability of the employer or his insurer is concerned.⁸²

So, where an employee suffering from a compensable injury is entitled to proceed before the industrial commission for aggravated disability caused by negligent performance of an operation undergone at the request of the insurance carrier, he is not entitled to maintain an action against the carrier for physicians' negligence.⁸³ In the absence of constitutional restriction, a compensation law permitting⁸⁴ or requiring⁸⁵ the employer to furnish proper medical treatment, or providing for readjustment of compensation in case of aggrava-

tion of disability,⁸⁶ or providing that no action shall be brought against any employer subject to the act by any employee to recover damages for malpractice or improper treatment received by such employee from any physician or hospital,⁸⁷ confines the injured employee to his remedy under the statute, precluding action against the employer for physician's malpractice. Under such circumstances the employer is not liable in damages on the ground that disability resulting from malpractice is nonaccidental where under statute only accidental injury is compensable.⁸⁸ A compensation act has also been held to bar an action by an injured employee against his employer based on the alleged failure of the latter to provide competent medical service and his alleged affirmative wrong in furnishing an incompetent nurse whose treatment aggravated the injury.⁸⁹

Under other authority, an action against an employer based on a physician's negligence in treating the injured employee is not barred by a previous proceeding in court sustaining the action of the industrial commission;⁹⁰ and an employee, injured in the course of his employment, is not limited, as against his employer, to his remedy under the compensation law, where he alleges negligent diagnosis by the employer's physician and the employer's failure to provide proper facilities and competent physicians.⁹¹ Where the aggravation of injuries is the result of the insurance carrier's wrongful act and is not compensable under the act, the employee may recover damages therefor in an independent action against the carrier.⁹² Where a compensation act does not require an employer to render medical aid and attention to an injured employee, an employer voluntarily and gratuitously assuming to render such aid is held to the same measure of duty as any other person in the same situation;⁹³ so, the act does not deprive an employee of the right to sue his employer for damages caused by negligent treatment of an injury, incurred in the course of the employment, by an unskilled and incompetent person to whom he is sent by the employer for examination and treatment.⁹⁴

Where the statute provides that, if an employee submits to an operation he shall, in addition to the surgical benefits therein provided for, be entitled to compensation for his actual disability following such operation, the employee is entitled to have the award opened and additional compensation allowed under this provision.⁹⁵

Pain and suffering. Where the compensation law authorizes the industrial commission to award compensation to an injured employee in an amount sufficient to compensate him for the result of the injury, although it was aggravated by the negligence or carelessness of the physician selected by the employer, the court has no authority in law to render a judgment for pain and suffering resulting therefrom.⁹⁶

§ 919. Matters Not within Scope of Acts

Rights and remedies of employers or employees, other than those provided by the compensation acts, are not barred as to matters not within the scope of the acts.

A compensation act excludes other remedies only when the conditions existing in a particular case have brought it within the terms of the act;⁹⁷ where the act is inapplicable, the common-law and statutory remedies of the employee remain intact or are not barred.⁹⁸

(2) If facts, when developed, showed that employee's alleged occupational disease occurred prior to date upon which both employee and employer accepted occupational disease amendment to compensation act, court had jurisdiction of action against employer for damages, and fact that damages would continue in the future would not divest the court of its jurisdiction to submit to jury question of damages, present and prospective.

No contrary legislative intent

That legislature failed to include within industrial insurance act compensation for industrial diseases, because of opposition of industrialists of state, is not indicative of legislative intent to exclude a recovery by one suffering from such a disease by taking away common-law action for damages for injuries inflicted because of negligence of employer.

The constitutional provision authorizing establishment of compensation fund and providing that compensation should be in lieu of all other rights to compensation or damages for death, injuries, or occupational disease did not deprive employee of right of action growing out of noncompensable occupational disease.

compensation only for injuries resulting from accident, or which excludes occupational disease from the operation of the act, does not bar an action for damages for occupational disease resulting from employer's negligence or breach of statutory duty,³⁷ nor does an act giving compensation for some occupational diseases bar the common-law remedy for other occupational diseases not listed.³⁸

Effect of statute

The statute providing that employers complying with compensation law should not be liable for injury or death of any employee did not deprive employee of right of action for employer's negligence directly resulting in a noncompensable occupational disease.

In Indiana

(1) Employer could not bring employee within provisions of occupational diseases act which deprive him of any cause of action he may have had before its passage and exclude him from provisions which give him a remedy for wrong he has suffered; provision in occupational diseases act against liability of employer for compensation other than for compensation therein provided has no application to an employee excluded from operation of act.

(2) Silicosis, the last exposure to which has been less than sixty days after June 7, 1937, is a noncompensable occupational disease under occupational diseases act, and employee suffering therefrom has right to an action at law for negligence of employer proximately causing such disease.

Termination of employment before enactment of statute

Employee's action for injuries allegedly sustained through employer's violation of statute requiring adequate provision for removal of dust and other impurities from workrooms held not barred by provisions of compensation law relating to diseases suffered by employee, where employment had ended prior to enactment of provisions extending law to such diseases.

Silicosis

(1) Employee may bring action at law against employer for damages resulting from occupational disease, such as silicosis, for which compensation law imposes no liability on employer to provide compensation.

N.Y.—Barrencotto v. Cocker Saw Co., 194 N.E. 61, 266 N.Y. 139.

(2) Prior to time when compensation law made provision with respect to silicosis contracted in the course of employment, that law was not a bar to an action for damages by an employee who had contracted the disease due to employer's fault.

N.Y.—Cope v. General Elec. Co., 101 N.Y.S.2d 46, affirmed 111 N.Y.S. 2d 16, 279 App.Div. 886, affirmed Cifolo v. General Elec. Co., 112 N.E.2d 197, 305 N.Y. 209, certiorari denied 79 S.Ct. 124, 346 U.S. 874, 98 L.Ed. 382.

(3) Amendment making silicosis a compensable disease does not bar a common-law right of action which became vested before effective date of the amendment.

N.Y.—Schwartz v. Queensboro Farm Products, 78 N.Y.S.2d 863, 191 Misc. 778.

(4) The New York workmen's compensation law does not bar the common-law remedy for injury from silicosis where the last injurious exposure occurred prior to Sept. 1, 1935.

U.S.—Mapes v. Massey-Harris Co., D.C.N.Y., 19 F.Supp. 667.

(5) In action against employer by employee for damages for silicosis,

However, it has been held that, since an employee had no right of action at common law against an employer for injury or death due to an occupational disease,³⁹ the failure of a compensation act to constitute an occupational disease a compensable injury does not take away any right of action.⁴⁰ A disability developing in little more than a week where the employee is without knowledge of the character of the element or force by which he is disabled is not an occupational disease outside the scope of the compensation act entitling him to recover damages outside the act.⁴¹

A disease, or impaired physical condition, which is not occupational in character and is therefore not within occupational disease provisions of the compensation statute may be the subject of an action for damages.⁴² With respect to a disease which is not occupational in character, it has been held that before the employee may be relegated to the compensation act for his exclusive remedy, if any, it must appear that the disease resulted from an accidental injury arising out of, and in the course of, his employment.⁴³ court would grant employee's motion to strike defense that compensation law was exclusive remedy, where employee's employment terminated prior to May, 1935, since employments terminating before such date are not within purview of provision of compensation act dealing with silicosis.

N.Y.—Gribsch v. B. T. Babbitt, Inc., 298 N.Y.S. 848, 164 Misc. 7, affirmed 2 N.Y.S.2d 848, 254 App.Div. 601.

(6) Employee who did not suffer any disability interfering with performance of his duties because of silicosis allegedly contracted through employer's neglect to provide proper safeguards, and who was discharged one month after enactment of statute authorizing compensation for occupational diseases resulting in disability or death, was not covered by compensation law, and hence was not precluded from maintaining common-law action for injuries to person based on negligence of employer.

N.Y.—Mutolo v. Utica General Jobbing Foundry, 292 N.Y.S. 14, 161 Misc. 327.

(7) Even though compensation for partial disability due to silicosis or other dust diseases was excluded by 1936 amendment to compensation act, employees could not recover in an action at law for partial disability caused by silicosis contracted after Sept. 1, 1935.

N.Y.—Cope v. General Elec. Co., 101 N.Y.S.2d 46, affirmed 111 N.Y.S.2d 16, 279 App.Div. 886, affirmed Cifolo v. General Elec. Co., 112 N.E.2d 197, 305 N.Y. 209, certiorari denied 74 S.Ct. 124, 846 U.S. 874, 98 L.Ed. 382.

(8) Compensation law providing that compensation is payable for total disability due to silicosis, but not for partial disability due to that disease, deprives employee of common-law right of damages for partial disability due to silicosis arising in the course of employment as a result of negligence of the employer, in absence of allegation that employer has failed to secure the payment of compensation.

N.Y.—Soraci v. Colonial Sand & Stone Co., 79 N.Y.S.2d 698, 191 Misc. 1056, affirmed, 94 N.Y.S.2d 820, 276 App.Div. 895, appeal denied 97 N.Y.S.2d 541, 277 App.Div. 769—Del Busto v. E. I. § 925. — Failure to Comply with Lawful Requirements

Where the facts bring the case within the compensation act, the fact that the employer may have violated statutory requirements may not prevent an action against him by the employee from being barred by the act.

The alleged violation of municipal or statutory regulations, even though their violation constitutes a criminal offense, cannot be made the basis of an action for damages against an employer who has complied with the compensation act where such regulations are inapplicable to the facts of the case.⁴⁴ Under a constitutional provision permitting compensation legislation taking away all rights of action or defenses from employees and employers, but providing that no right of action should be taken away from any employee when injury arose from failure of the employer to comply with any lawful requirement for protection of the lives, health, and safety of employees, a compensation law which makes safety requirements of so uncertain and indefinite a nature as to furnish no standard to guide the employer as to his duties cannot be made the basis of an action brought by the employee to re-

Cumulative effect

Where disease was alleged to have resulted progressively from cumulative effect of conditions to which employee was subjected at all times during employment, and whole of employment under such conditions weakened his health so as to have made him susceptible to disease which he finally contracted, there was no accidental injury within meaning of compensation law.

cover damages,⁴⁵ even though the prescribed standard had been accepted and acted on for a long period of years;⁴⁶ but also it has been stated by the same authority in more recent decisions that any requirement stated in general terms will be regarded as definite, if the knowledge of details necessary to make it definite and certain may fairly be imputed to the employer, and as authorizing a suit against him for damages by an injured employee,⁴⁷ but not by an employee suffering from an occupational disease.⁴⁸

The general obligation of care and caution resting on employers and employees to protect life⁴⁹ and the common-law duty of an employer to warn an employee of obvious dangers in the operation of dangerous machinery⁵⁰ are not lawful requirements, within the meaning of the statute, the violation of which will give a right of action for damages against an employer complying with the act; nor do the general safety orders of the commission presumptively fix a reasonable and proper standard;⁵¹ nor will an action for damages lie against an employer for alleged violation of a statute providing merely for coöperation of the commission with the employer in fixing standards of safety, there being no statutory obligation on the employer to take the initiative to establish such standards.⁵²

Where the facts clearly bring the case within the provisions of the compensation act, the fact that there may have been a violation by the employer of the factory act⁵³ or the state labor law⁵⁴ does not prevent the application of the compensation act, or prevent an action from being barred thereby; and where an employee's injuries are caused by an accident arising out of, and in the course of, his employment, the fact that the employer violated the dangerous occupation act does not take the employee's claim out of the compensation act.⁵⁵

Illegal business. Where the nature of the employer's business is illegal, an employee may choose to sue in the courts for any injury sustained, and is not bound by the compensation law.⁵⁶

a. In General

Under some compensation acts, an employee injured by his employer's willful or deliberate act or negligence may sue for damages, the remedy under the act not being exclusive.

that of his agent,⁵⁹ the expression "willful act" being employed in the sense of willful negligence.⁶⁰ Under such statute, an employee injured by his employer's willful⁶¹ or deliberate⁶² act may sue for damages, even exemplary, or punitive, damages in cases where allowed and where justified by the facts.⁶³

A willful violation of duty by the employer signifies a conscious violation;⁶⁴ but mere negligence, in the absence of violation of statutory requirement, or a commission's orders is not willfulness within the meaning of the rule;⁶⁵ nor is gross negligence a willful act done with the direct object of injuring another.⁶⁶

The meaning of the phrase "deliberate intention," in this connection, is that the employer must have determined to injure an employee⁶⁷ and used some means appropriate to that end;⁶⁸ and there must be a specific intent.⁶⁹ Violation of law, even though deliberately committed, does not constitute deliberate intention to injure within the meaning of the statute.⁷⁰

Where the statute restricts the liability of the employer in such cases to injury arising from the willful act of the employer's agent, the injured employee is not entitled to sue for damages for injury arising from the willful act of a fellow servant, an agent being one in authority over the servants.⁷¹

Failure to discover burglar alarm

Mere negligence in failing to discover burglar alarm in form of spring gun was not tantamount to a malicious or deliberate intent on part of employer to assault employee, and where employer had no knowledge of existence of such device employee could not maintain common-law action for disfigurement against employer, since "malicious" and "willfully" involve ill will of a degree that is equivalent of a deliberate intent to injure others, and there is no such thing as a negligent assault.

Intent not inferred from negligence

(1) The element of "malicious or deliberate intent" required on the part of an employer with respect to an assault of his employee, in order to give the employee the option of either suing for damages at common law or proceeding under the compensation act, is a conscious and deliberate intent directed to the purpose of inflicting an injury, and such intent may not be inferred from mere negligence, although it is gross.

Minn.—Brehmhorst v. Beckman, 35 N.W.2d 719, 227 Minn. 409.

(2) Negligence, however wanton, is not tantamount to deliberate intention to inflict injury which is essential to charge employer with damages in excess of sums paid to employee under compensation law.

W.Va.—Brewer v. Appalachian Constructors, 65 S.E.2d 87, 135 W.Va. 739.

Carelessness insufficient

Statute authorizing employee's recovery, in addition to compensation act for injury resulting from employer's "deliberate intention" to produce injury was held not to authorize recovery for injuries sustained on breaking of line used, with knowledge of its defectiveness, for hauling logs, since there must be specific intent to injure employee and use of some means appropriate thereto, not merely carelessness, however gross, to warrant recovery under statute.

b. Assault

Authorities differ as to whether an employee assaulted by his employer or by a fellow servant may sue his employer for damages or is relegated to his remedy under the compensation act.

Assault by an employer on his employee has been held not to arise out of, or not to occur in the course of, the employment, within the compensation act, so that an action for damages will lie;⁷² other authority, in holding that a suit for assault may be brought at common law, holds that the compensation law does not apply in such a situation.⁷³ The employee may have an election between seeking recovery under the compensation act or suing for full damages at common law.⁷⁴

Likewise, it is held, a willful or intentional assault by an employee on a fellow employee cannot be classified as accidental, even though the consequent injury may not have been deliberately designed, and an action against the employer will lie;⁷⁵ and an employee willfully assaulted by an agent or servant of the employer acting within the scope of his authority may sue at common law, and is not relegated solely to workmen's compensation.⁷⁶ This principle has been held applicable where the employer is a corporation and there is no issue as to whether the agent, in committing the assault, acted within the scope of his authority;⁷⁷ so, where an assault is committed by the manager of a corporation, he may be considered the alter ego of the corporation employer.⁷⁸

Under other authority, while an individual employer cannot plead the bar of workmen's compensation for an assault which he has willfully committed on an employee,⁷⁹ the situation is quite different with respect to a corporation,⁸⁰ and in an employee's action against a corporate employer and fellow employees for assault the compensation statute is a defense which may be applicable, with respect to the corporation, depending on the proof.⁸¹

A compensation act has also been held to bar an action by an employee against his employer for an assault committed by the latter's manager,⁸² foreman,⁸³ or dock boss,⁸⁴ or by a nurse in a hospital maintained by the employer.⁸⁵

§ 927. — Gross Negligence

Whether an employee may recover damages, or punitive damages, for injury caused by his employer's gross negligence, or is relegated to his remedy under the compensation act, is determined by the language of the act.

The remedy afforded an employee under the compensation act may be exclusive where injury results from gross negligence of the employer or a fellow employee.⁸⁶ However, under statute, gross negligence of the employer may be made an exception to the statutory provision that proceedings before the commission shall be the exclusive remedy,⁸⁷ although an amendatory statute omitting the words of exception in an earlier act changes the rule.⁸⁸ Violation of a statute or an order of the commission,⁸⁹ especially where general in terms,⁹⁰ does not of itself constitute gross negligence bringing the employee's rights within the scope of the exception.

The common-law right of action for gross negligence is preserved by the Texas act only when the employee's injury results in death.⁹¹

Additional or punitive damages may not be recovered, in a common-law action, on the ground of the employer's gross negligence, where the compensation law provides an exclusive remedy against the employer for injuries sustained by an employee as a result of an accident or disease arising out of the employment.⁹²

It has been held that under the Texas compensation act an injured employee may bring suit for gross negligence and recover exemplary damages therefor if he can;⁹³ but under other authority the right to recover exemplary damages because of the gross negligence of the employer is limited to claims for the death of the employee,⁹⁴ and the act excludes actions by the employee to recover exemplary damages for gross negligence.⁹⁵

§ 928. — Failure to Install or Maintain Safety Appliances

Whether an employer's failure to install or maintain safety appliances takes the case out of the rule as to exclusive remedy by way of the compensation act depends on the language of the act.

The general rule has been said to be that, in the absence of specific statutory provision, the failure of the employer to comply with laws or regulations as to the installation of safety appliances or proper safeguards, especially in the case of dangerous machinery, does not affect the rule as to exclusive remedy by way of the compensation laws.⁹⁶ However, under some statutes, the failure of the employer to install or maintain safety appliances required by statute is made an exception to the exclusive remedy rule, and an action to recover damages for injuries arising therefrom may be maintained by the injured workman,⁹⁷ if, where the stat-

Employer's knowledge of servant's viciousness

In employee's action against fellow servant and corporate employer for assault by servant, allegations that employer knew of fellow servant's viciousness, but gave him authority over other employees and made available for his use, in connection with his duties, a tear gas gun known to defendants to be dangerous and deadly weapon, did not save such common-law action from destruction by compensation law, under which plaintiff was required to seek relief.

ute so requires, the omission is intentional,⁹⁸ and is the omission of an elective officer, where the employer is a corporation.⁹⁹

The rule that the compensation act does not exclude actions for damages resulting from violation of a safety appliance law applies also where injury is caused by violation of a federal safety appliance law which by its terms extends its protection to employees whether engaged in interstate or local transit;¹ but the fact that the employer violated such federal law, thereby becoming liable to a penalty, has been held not to deprive him of the right to the protection of the state compensation law.² The rule does not apply where the compensation act in terms excludes common-law remedies for "all accidents occurring within this Commonwealth" and no exception is made for injury resulting from neglect of a statutory duty.³

§ 929. — Violation of Safety Regulations

Under some statutes an injured employee may sue for damages for injuries arising from a violation of safety regulations.

Under some statutes a violation of safety regulations by an employer is made an exception to the exclusive remedy rule, and an action to recover damages for injuries arising therefrom may be maintained by the injured employee⁴ if, where the statute so requires, the omission is intentional⁵ and is the omission of an elective officer where the employer is a corporation.⁶

§ 930. — Violation of Child Labor Laws

If the employment of a minor in violation of child labor law does not exclude the minor from the coverage provided by workmen's compensation law, the right of recovery for the minor's injury or death may be limited to that provided under the compensation law, and there may be no right of recovery in an action under the common law.

Under many workmen's compensation act provisions, a minor whose employment is in violation of law may be within the scope of the coverage provided by the act, as stated supra § 113 c; and where the employment of a minor is in violation of child labor laws, if the illegality of the employment does not exclude the minor from the coverage of the workmen's compensation acts, the minor may be limited to the recovery provided by the terms of the compensation act, and may not be entitled to maintain an action at law against the employer.⁷ Simi-

Where minor engaged in employment prohibited by law to one of his age was injured after reaching age at which employment was permitted by law, minor's only right of recovery was under compensation act and no common-law right of recovery existed.

N.M.—Benson v. Expert Equipment Corp., 164 P.2d 380, 49 N.M. 356.

Illegally employed minor held employee

Where a minor was employed in violation of the Illinois child labor law, and at the time of injury the employer had two policies of insurance, one for workmen's compensa-

larly, where an illegally employed minor is entitled to recover for injuries only under the provisions of the compensation act, and is not entitled to maintain an action at law for the injuries, the minor's beneficiaries and personal representatives are likewise relegated to the remedy provided by the compensation law, and are not entitled to maintain an action at law;⁸ and it has been held that restricting the right to recover for injuries or death sustained by a minor whose employment was in violation of child labor law to the recovery that is authorized by compensation law does not impair the child labor law.⁹ Other compensation acts permit, but do not require, an illegally employed minor to resort to the compensation laws, as stated supra § 113 c, and under such compensation acts a minor who is employed in violation of child labor laws has the option to proceed under the compensation law or sue at common law.¹⁰

Under some workmen's compensation act provisions, an eligible employer who has not accepted the act so as to enable his employees to receive compensation is deprived of the right to set up certain defenses in a common-law action brought by an injured employee, as discussed infra §§ 939-943. Such a provision of a compensation act, freeing employees prosecuting actions at common law for injuries received in the course of their employment from defenses which, prior to the act, would have been available to the employer, is applicable to a minor employee whose employment was violative of a child labor law requiring a certificate or permit for the minor to be entitled to engage in the employment.¹¹

In a number of cases decided under workmen's compensation act provisions now or formerly existing, it has been held that an illegally employed minor is not within the scope of the coverage of the act, as stated supra § 113 b. Where this rule has been followed it has been held that the employment of a minor in violation of child labor law places the minor outside the terms of the workmen's compensation act, and permits or compels the minor or his personal representative to seek recovery for the minor's injury or death in a proceeding other than that authorized by the act,¹² and this rule has been

tion and the other for public liability, and the public liability policy specifically excluded employees of the insured, in an action for a declaratory judgment it was held that the minor was an employee under the Illinois compensation law, and was within the exclusion clause of the public liability policy.

Saving provision not retroactive

Where at the time of the injury the minor employee, although employed in violation of the child labor law, was sixteen years old and thus entitled to recover only under the provisions of the compensation act which contained a saving provision to the effect that the act should not deprive infants under sixteen years of their common-law remedy, the fact that at the time the case was heard the legislature had amended the saving provision so that the act did not deprive infants under the age of eighteen years of their common-law remedy did not permit the minor employee to seek recovery in a common-law action, since the amendment of the saving provision was not retroactive.

applied where the minor has secured his employment by falsely or mistakenly stating his age.¹³ Under this rule, if the minor's employment was not violative of the child labor law the right of recovery would be only under the compensation act, and there would be no right of recovery under the common law.¹⁴

Under some statutes qualifying the general rule, the employment must have been in willful and known violation of the child labor law to deprive the employer of the protection afforded by the compensation act, and to permit the maintenance of a common-law action to recover for the injury or death;¹⁵ and a failure to guard machinery as required by the child labor law does not of itself establish the fact that the employment was a known and willful violation of that law,¹⁶ although, under the terms of the child labor law, the bringing of an action for damages may be authorized on the basis of failure to guard machinery as well as on the unlawful employment.¹⁷ The rule that violation of the child labor law of a state subjects the employer to liability in damages for injuries received by the minor does not apply when the illegality of the employment arises solely from violation of a municipal ordinance;¹⁸ and the rule does not apply to permit the representative of a deceased minor employee to recover in a common-law or statutory action where the employment of the minor was legal under the laws of the state although in contravention of federal law.¹⁹

Under Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act. It is stated supra § 113 c that a minor employee is not excluded from the coverage provided by the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act, 33 U.S.C.A. § 901 et seq, because the minor's employment was in violation of a child labor law, and where a minor employer is within the coverage provided by the Longshoremen's Act, the fact that the minor's employment was violative of a child labor law will not authorize a recovery in a common-law suit for injuries sustained by the minor.²⁰

§ 931. On Rejection of Act

Where an employer or an employee has rejected the compensation act, remedies other than those provided by the act are available.

The remedy of an employee who has rejected the compensation act lies in damages recoverable from his employer under statute or the common law.²¹ The right of an injured employee to sue his employer may be required to be exercised before the injury by rejecting the compensation act at the time of the employment.²²

Pacific Tea Co., C.A.Fla., 212 F.2d 130.

Abrogation or restoration of defenses

(1) Where employer had affirmatively elected not to operate under the compensation act, action by an employee against employer for injuries was governed by common law, except in so far as common-law defenses of contributory negligence, fellow servant, and assumption of risk were abrogated.

U.S.—Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Robards, C.C.A.N.C., 161 F. 2d 929.

(2) Purpose of provision of occupational diseases act setting up cause of action for damages against an employer who has not elected to pay compensation is to induce employers to elect to come under compensation provision by restoring to them defenses of assumption of risk and negligence of a fellow servant in an action for damages brought by an employee who has elected not to be bound by compensation provisions.

Ind.—Dalton Foundries v. Jefferies, 51 N.E.2d 13, 114 Ind.App. 271, followed in Dalton Foundries v. Dean, 51 N.E.2d 397, 114 Ind.App. 289.

(3) Abrogation of defenses see infra §§ 939-943.

Injury arising out of, or in course of, employment

(1) An employer who has rejected the Nevada industrial insurance act is liable for injury to a servant sustained through negligence of the employer and arising out of, and in the usual course of, employment.

U.S.—Gonzalez v. Pacific Fruit Exp. Co., D.C.Nev., 99 F.Supp. 1012.

(2) Any employee of employer subject to, but not assenting to, compensation act, may recover, in common-law action, from such employer for injuries sustained in course of employment.

Me.—Bartley v. Couture, 55 A.2d 438, 143 Me. 69.

(3) Where employers of injured employee had exempted themselves from operation of compensation act, employee could institute common-law action to recover damages for injury on the ground of negligence, although injury was sustained in course of employment.

N.C.—Muldrow v. Weinstein, 68 S.E. 2d 249, 234 N.C. 587.

Default in filing pay rolls and paying premiums

Employer's default in filing of his pay rolls and payment of his premiums resulted in a statutory rejection of the industrial insurance act at the time of accident complained of by employee.

Nev.—Provenzano v. Long, 183 P.2d 639, 64 Nev. 412.

Employee not limited to claim against insurer

Where employer elected not to be bound by compensation law, an injured employee was not limited to making claim for compensation against insurer from which the employer obtained a standard workmen's compensation and employer's liability policy, and employee had right to sue employer for damages at law.

U.S.—Union Oil Co. of California v. Hunt, C.C.A.Or., 111 F.2d 269.

Withdrawal after qualification

(1) The responsibility to injured employee of employer which had qualified under compensation act and had then withdrawn from it prior to injury was the common-law responsibility less the common-law defenses.

Tenn.—Pearson Hardwood Flooring Co. v. Phillips, 120 S.W.2d 973, 22 Tenn.App. 206.

(2) An employer could not defeat employee's right to recover for injuries sustained on ground that employee's action was under compensation act because of failure to prove that employer had complied with law in withdrawing from act under which employer had once qualified, where employer's president had stated to employee before trial, and had also testified, that it had withdrawn from the act.

Tenn.—Pearson Hardwood Flooring Co. v. Phillips, supra.

Disease

(1) If disease resulted progressively from the cumulative effect of conditions to which employee was subjected, as distinguished from an accident, and if result of disease is peculiar to employment and employer has not accepted benefits of compensation act on occupational disease, employee has a common-law action against employer based upon negligence.

U.S.—Henson v. U. S., D.C.Mo., 88 F. Supp. 148.

(2) A court has jurisdiction over an action against an employer to recover for damages arising from an occupational disease only on the theory that defendant has rejected the provisions of the occupational disease act; it has no jurisdiction over an action to recover for such damages on the theory that, although at the time disability arose defendant had rejected the provisions of the act, it was under a contractual obligation to accept them by reason of a collective bargaining agreement with the union of which plaintiff was a member.

Principal contractor; subcontractor

(1) The rule applies to a principal contractor who is the statutory employer of the subcontractor's employees on the job; if the statutory employer rejects the act, his common-law liability to the workmen on the job remains; nor will the fact that the subcontractor, who is the actual employer, has accepted the act, and the injured employee has received compensation thereunder, relieve the statutory employer, who has rejected the act, from his common-law liability.

tion law, concerning occupational diseases, the employee may be entitled to exercise his common-law right of suit in trespass and trial by jury.²⁹

Time for rejection of act by minor. The statutory period within which a minor must file a rejection of benefits under the compensation acts, so as to be entitled to maintain a suit at law for injuries, begins to run against him from the date of the injury, and not from the date of the appointment of a guardian.³⁰

§ 932. Failure to Comply with Act

An employee may sue his employer for negligence where the latter, although subject to the compensation act, has failed to comply with its requirements.

Recovery at common law is open to an employee injured by the negligence of his employer who, although subject to the compensation act, has not qualified thereunder by complying with its requirements.³¹ This has been held to be so even where the employee is injured before the commission has been appointed and before the employer has had opportunity to comply;³² but compliance by the employer as soon as he has opportunity to comply, even though after the accident and done to escape common-law liability therefor, bars the employee's right to the common-law remedy.³³

§ 933. Failure to Provide Insurance or Secure Compensation

Failure of an employer, subject to the compensation act, to provide insurance or secure the payment of compensation may subject him to an action by the employee for damages.

The failure of an employer who is subject to the compensation act to provide insurance or secure the payment of compensation may subject him to liability in an action at law to recover damages, brought by the employee,³⁴ or, under some statutes,

Injury arising out of, and in course of, employment

An employer, who came within provisions of compensation act, but did not take necessary steps to bring himself and his employees within terms thereof, was subject to common-law action for injury to employee arising out of, and in course of, employment.

R.I.—Rossi v. Ronci, 7 A.2d 773, 63 R.I. 250.

Option of employee or representative

(1) Under compensation act, the right to sue the employer at common law is inherent in the employee only in those cases in which the employer has failed to comply with the act, in which case the employee, or his representative in cases of death, has the option of either claiming compensation under the act or maintaining an action at common law for damages on account of the injury.

Md.—Kramer v. Globe Brewing Co., 2 A.2d 634, 175 Md. 461.

(2) General purpose of compensation act is to protect employees coming within it by authorizing employees of noncomplying employers to bring suits against them for damages or apply to compensation bureau for compensation awards.

Ohio.—Cameron v. Ringling Bros.—Barnum & Bailey Combined Shows, 5 Ohio Supp. 235.

Effect of compliance by other employer

Employee of operator of sawmill, suing operator as well as owner of timber, was entitled to maintain common-law action against operator for negligence, where operator had not complied with compensation act, even though owner or some other employer may have complied therewith. Tenn.—Copeland v. Cherry, 95 S.W.2d 1275, 20 Tenn.App. 117.

Furnishing reports; contributing to fund

(1) The provision of the compensation act making an employer liable to suit in certain cases, as a punitive measure, on failure to furnish certain reports to the department of labor and industry refers only to the particular reports specified in the statute, and, as a penal clause, must be strictly construed.

Wash.—Lubich v. Pacific Highway Transport, 202 P.2d 270, 32 Wash. 2d 457.

(2) Under Washington compensation act, if employer had not made reports or contributed to accident fund, deceased employee's beneficiary could elect to sue for death by wrongful act of employer.

(2) Defendant's employees, injured while acting within course of their employment and subject to compensation laws, were fully protected by defendant's application for coverage and payment of an advance premium to industrial commission, and an error in accounting could not be basis of an action on behalf of an employee against defendant as a noncomplying employer.

Ohio.—Brown v. L. A. Wells Const. Co., App., 67 N.E.2d 110, affirmed 56 N.E.2d 451, 143 Ohio St. 580.

(3) Where employer procured compensation policy prior to date of injury to employee, but "coverage card" had not been received by commission until after injury, and insurance carrier had on file copy of its standard policy of compensation, compensation act was complied with, and employee was precluded from bringing action in district court, but was required to bring claim before state industrial commission; statute requiring employer to post notice that he has secured compensation insurance held directory.

Okl.—Akin v. Shelton, 53 P.2d 661, 175 Okl. 536.

(4) Where compensation insurer expressly agreed to pay entire amount of compensation due, and actually paid compensation to widow of employee, insurer thereby acknowledged liability and hence widow could recover statutory compensation only, and not actual damages, irrespective of whether employer paid premium.

U.S.—Gomillion v. Union Bridge & Construction Co. of Kansas City, Mo., C.C.A.Tex., 100 F.2d 937, certiorari denied 59 S.Ct. 1081, 307 U.S. 634, 83 L.Ed. 1516.

(5) Where insurer agreed to pay, and did pay, compensation for workman's death, his widow could not recover actual damages for death, as against contention that "participation and assessment indorsement" superseded the policy and made the employer in effect a self-insurer rather than a subscriber under compensation law.

U.S.—Gomillion v. Union Bridge & Construction Co. of Kansas City, Mo., supra.

Determination of question by court

Where a determination of whether an employer was covered by state industrial insurance, denied by industrial commission for reason that employer was in default in filing of pay rolls and payment of premiums, required not only a finding of facts under conflicting evidence, but also determination of numerous questions of both law and equity in connection therewith, district court had jurisdiction to make determination, as against contention that commission had exclusive jurisdiction.

General contractor; subcontractor

(1) If general contractor fails to secure payment of compensation, an action at law may be maintained against him for injury of employee. Fla.—Brickley v. Gulf Coast Const. Co., 14 So.2d 265, 153 Fla. 216.

(2) Remedy of employee of subcontractor who had failed to provide workmen's compensation was limited as against prime contractor by provisions of state compensation law, and federal district court lacked jurisdiction to entertain negligence action by such employee against prime contractor.

U.S.—Huffstettler v. Lion Oil Co., C.A.Ark., 208 F.2d 549.

Employee's knowledge of employer's failure

That plaintiff employee knew that employer employed more than three employees and did not have compensation insurance would not necessarily preclude recovery by employee for injuries sustained as result of employer's negligence.

pliance on a showing of solvency and ability to pay.³⁶ The good faith of the employer in attempting to secure compensation insurance is not the test in determining whether he may be sued by his employee for damages;³⁷ and an employer is not relieved of such suit by the erroneous interpretation of the compensation statute by the attorney general and the department of labor and industries, who believed the employer not to be within the statute.³⁸

In some jurisdictions, where the employer fails to insure, the action at law is the only remedy;³⁹ in others, compensation under the statute is the only remedy, the right to bring an action of law having been abrogated;⁴⁰ in still others, the injured employee has an election, or option, and may sue for damages or bring proceedings to secure compensation under the act,⁴¹ the reasoning in some cases basing the employer's liability under the act on his failure to reject, and his common-law liability on his failure to insure.⁴² In at least one jurisdiction the employee, under such circumstances, may proceed both under the compensation statute and by action for damages, at the same time;⁴³ he is not required to apply for compensation under the statute before beginning his action at law.⁴⁴

Employee of major employer

Mo.—Daniels v. Luechtefeld, App., 155 S.W.2d 807.

Right to sue for wrongful death not reinstated

Statutory amendment providing that if employer fails to secure payment of compensation, employee or his legal representative may have the choice between claiming compensation under the compensation law or suing at law for damages did not operate to repeal the compensation law and reinstate right to maintain an action for the wrongful death of an employee, as it existed prior to original enactment of the statute.

Miss.—Allen v. R. G. Le Tourneau, Inc., 71 So.2d 447, 220 Miss. 520.

The employer's failure to report the accident, as required by statute, does not give the claimant an option to claim compensation or bring an action for damages, where such option is given by statute only in case of the employer's failure to prove his financial ability or to procure insurance.

"Under section 3706 of the Labor Code, the injured employee may bring an action for damages in any case where his employer failed to carry compensation insurance, and this right may be exercised independently of any proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission." Cal.—Chakmakjian v. Lowe, 201 P.2d 801, 802, 33 C.2d 308.

Effect of payment of compensation

(1) Payment in full of award of industrial accident commission to employee did not deprive superior court of jurisdiction of action for damages against employers who failed to carry compensation insurance. Cal.—Hicks v. Ocean Shore R. R., 117 P.2d 850, 18 C.2d 773.

(2) The phrase, in compensation act, that if any employer "shall fail to secure the payment of compensation," any injured employee may bring an action against employer for damages, refers to the time before the contingency arises that requires payment of compensation and not the actual payment.

Cal.—Coffin v. Bloodworth, 82 P.2d 953, 28 C.A.2d 522.

Payment of medical bills and wages

Employer who failed to comply with requirements of compensation act by securing compensation insurance or consent to self-insure was subject to suit for damages for injuries sustained by employee, although employer had paid employee's medical bills and wages during disability.

to the compensation act;⁴⁵ likewise, the option of an injured employee to claim compensation or maintain an action for damages, where his employer has failed to carry compensation insurance or to qualify as a self-insurer, is limited to employees covered by the compensation act, and has no application to employees not covered thereby.⁴⁶ Where the claimant asserts only his rights under the compensation law, and no others, a provision as to the effect of the employer's failure to contribute to the industrial accident fund is not pertinent, and its operation need not be determined.⁴⁷

Where the employer fails to comply with the insurance requirements, the employee retains the common-law action, if any, which he had prior to the enactment of the compensation act,⁴⁸ or has all the rights of action which he would have had if the compensation act had not been passed,⁴⁹ and no new cause of action is created.⁵⁰

An employee has no right to proceed with an action at law on the basis of the alleged failure of the employer to provide insurance if, after receiving notice of delinquency, the employer pays within the time allowed by statute in such cases,⁵¹ or if he has filed an application to be a self-insurer and the commission has failed to act thereon,⁵² the employer being entitled to the protection of the act, as of the date of his application;⁵³ nor can the action at law be maintained in the absence of evidence that the employer had failed to make his remittances to the insurance fund,⁵⁴ especially where the expressed willingness of the commission to pay compensation to the employee justifies an inference that all remittances due had been paid.⁵⁵

On the other hand, where an employee is injured before his employer has qualified as a self-insurer under the compensation law, his right to sue at common law accrues, and is not affected by the employer's later qualification;⁵⁶ nor will the right of dependents to compensation under the statute be defeated by the employer's delinquency in payment of premiums at the time of the accident where payment is made subsequently.⁵⁷

Failure to name employee in policy. The fact that an injured employee is not named in his employer's compensation policy does not enable him to maintain an action against his employer based on common-law negligence.⁵⁸

§ 934. Failure to Give Notice

Whether an employer's failure to give notice that he has subscribed to the compensation act leaves his injured employee free to sue for damages depends on the language of the statute.

Under sections of the compensation act requiring an employer subscribing thereto to give written notice, or to post notice, to employees that he has subscribed, and, in some instances, requiring an employee, otherwise within the act, to notify the employer that he rejects the act, if he wishes to retain his rights to sue at common law, failure of the employer to notify a workman that he has subscribed to the act may leave the workman, who is injured, free to pursue his remedy at common law.⁵⁹

Employer presumptively excluded from act

Where employer which was presumptively excluded from provisions of compensation act, because it regularly employed less than fifteen employees, elected to come within provisions of act, but did not notify an employee or post the notice of such election required by the act, such em-

This is true even though the employee has failed to notify the employer of his rejection of the act, the statutory requirement as to notice by the employee applying only where the employee would otherwise be brought within the act.⁶⁰

However, particular provisions requiring the posting of notice have been held not to give an employee the right to maintain an action at law, on failure to post, in view of other provisions of the statute,⁶¹ as where it is specifically provided, by amendment to the compensation law, that a failure to post such notices shall not in any way affect the exclusiveness of the remedy provided for in the compensation law.⁶² Also, where the statute in terms limits its effect to extension of time allowed the employee for notifying the employer of the accident, failure of the employer to give notice of his subscription to the act does not deprive him of its protection.⁶³

§ 935. Failure to Pay Compensation

Failure to pay compensation does not authorize the bringing of an action at law where the compensation act is applicable and it does not provide for an action on such nonpayment.

Failure of the employer and his insurer to pay compensation to an injured employee does not authorize the bringing of an action at law, where the conditions making the compensation act applicable are shown to exist and there is no provision therein permitting an action at law when compensation is not paid;⁶⁵ nor is failure to pay compensation a failure to secure compensation which, as discussed supra § 933, may justify the bringing of an action at law.⁶⁶ An employer, by procuring a stay of compensation proceedings pending proceedings in admiralty to limit liability, does not thereby repudiate his obligation under the act so as to authorize a recovery of damages at common law.⁶⁷

Where an employer and an employee enter into an agreement for the payment of compensation for injuries sustained by the employee, and the employer abandons the agreement without waiting for, or seeking, any determination of the employee's disability as contemplated by the agreement, the employee is not barred from bringing an action against the employer for such injuries.⁶⁸ employee was not required to make a compensation act proceeding his exclusive remedy for a civil assault and battery allegedly committed upon him by employer's agent.

S.C.—Herring v. Lawrence Warehouse Co., 72 S.E.2d 453, 222 S.C. 226.

Estoppel of employer

Where employer is sued at common law by employee who alleges that employer had not accepted provisions of compensation act, and employer, by answer, specifically admits such allegations, employer is estopped thereafter to assert that case should be dismissed because employee had not shown that employer had not given notice required by the act.

Nonhazardous employee

Under such provision, a nonhazardous employee of an employer who has secured compensation is in the same position as a hazardous employee with respect to exclusiveness of compensation benefits and question whether employer has complied with section relating to posting of notice of employer's election to obtain coverage is immaterial on issue of whether compensation coverage extends to an injured nonhazardous employee.

N.Y.—Murphy v. Elmwood Country Club, 51 N.Y.S.2d 260, 183 Misc. 332.

Decisions prior to amendment

(1) Prior to enactment of amendment, it was held that employer could not escape liability for failure to furnish employee with a safe place to work on ground that he had compensation coverage, where he failed to prove that notice respecting compensation had been posted as required by statute.

Whether plaintiff's injury and resultant disability were compensable under the act or not, his claim therefor was within the jurisdiction of the compensation commission, and, having proceeded before it under the act, he may not thereafter maintain an action at law . . . Plaintiff proceeded before the compensation commission on the theory that his injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, but, now, in an action at law, proceeds on the theory that it did not so arise. Having adopted one theory before the compensation commission, he may not thereafter bring other proceedings based upon an inconsistent, opposite theory or claim."

Filing of claim

Tex.—Jones v. Jeffreys, Civ.App., 244 S.W.2d 924, error refused.

(2) The rule applies despite employer's failure to show compliance with compensation law as to posting notice of obtaining security for payment of compensation.

The general rule is that, unless such election is avoided for some equitable cause,⁶⁹ an action by an employee against his employer to recover damages is barred by his election to take compensation under the statute,⁷⁰ as evidenced by bringing proceedings to secure compensation,⁷¹ even though the

(5) An action is not barred by the filing of a claim with the compensation commission where done in a tentative way, and subsequently to filing of the suit at common law.

Tex.—Rice v. Garrett, Civ.App., 194 S.W. 667.

(6) It has also been held that where an employee did not have two co-existing remedial rights by way of workmen's compensation and personal injury action against employer, but had an exclusive compensation remedy if accident arose out of, and in course of, her employment, the mere filing of compensation claim was not such an election of remedies or such an estoppel as would preclude him from maintaining action.

N.H.—McBride v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 185 A. 652, 88 N.H. 187.

Accord or satisfaction

(1) Where injured seaman accepted state workmen's compensation he could not recover in admiralty for maintenance, since compensation was substitute for maintenance and there was an accord and satisfaction.

U.S.—Owens v. Hammond Lumber Co., D.C.Cal., 8 F.Supp. 392.

(2) Where employee received award of the compensation board and medical payments, and tendered back the award, but retained the medical payments, and brought a separate action for negligence of the employer, even if the board had no jurisdiction the final award and acceptance of it would be deemed a satisfaction of any cause against the employer.

N.Y.—Meaney v. Keating, 102 N.Y.S.2d 514, 200 Misc. 308, affirmed 113 N.Y.S.2d 240, 279 App.Div. 1030, affirmed 112 N.E.2d 783, 305 N.Y. 660.

Proper remedy for relief of employee who signed receipt for final compensation settlement was under statute providing for review of award or order by compensation board, and not common-law action for damages.

Ky.—Kentucky Road Oiling Co. v. Sharp, 78 S.W.2d 38, 257 Ky. 378.

Action under Federal Employers' Liability Act

(1) The acceptance by an injured employee of compensation under a state workmen's compensation law is not a release of a cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 51 et seq., nor does it estop the employee to sue under the federal act, if the injury is governed by it.

Ill.—Wetterer v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 277 Ill.App. 275, certiorari denied Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Wetterer, 55 S.Ct. 835, 295 U.S. 754, 79 L.Ed. 1698.

Action against government

(1) In libel by stevedore against government for injuries sustained on government-operated ship, fact that stevedore had filed a claim with federal employees' compensation commission and accepted compensation was a valid defense, since by accepting compensation he elected his remedy and surrendered any right of action he might have had against the government under the Suits in Admiralty Act, if the ship was a merchant vessel, or the Public Vessels Act if the ship was a public vessel.

U.S.—Militano v. U. S., C.C.A.N.Y., 156 F.2d 599, certiorari dismissed State Marine Corp. v. Militano, 67 S.Ct. 193, 329 U.S. 682, 91 L.Ed. 600.

(2) Defense that stevedore had accepted compensation was not defective on ground that no award was made by the commission, where commission dealt with stevedore's application in usual manner and marked the file "final" which meant that claim was closed subject only to being reopened if additional claim for recurrent disability should be filed. U.S.—Militano v. U. S., C.C.A.N.Y., 156 F.2d 599, certiorari dismissed State Marine Corp. v. Militano, 67 S.Ct. 193, 329 U.S. 682, 91 L.Ed. 600.

(3) Defense was not defective on theory that stevedore's rights were protected by War Shipping Act extending rights to seaman employed through the War Shipping Administration, where he was not a member of crew of government vessel and was not employed through the War Shipping Administration, but was a longshoreman on stevedore pay roll of the army base in Brooklyn.

U.S.—Militano v. U. S., C.C.A.N.Y., 156 F.2d 599, certiorari dismissed State Marine Corp. v. Militano, 67 S.Ct. 193, 329 U.S. 682, 91 L.Ed. 600.

(4) Where civilian employees of the United States, injured in explosion while engaged in repairing vessel of United States, accepted compensation payments under the federal employees compensation act, they were thereby barred from maintaining tort actions under the Public Vessels Act, although no final awards had been made to them by compensation commission, and although commission had not advised them that they might have a right of action against the United States in tort for damages.

U.S.—Gibbs v. U. S., D.C.Cal., 94 F.Supp. 586.

(5) A civil service employee engaged as a seaman on a public vessel of the United States, having filed a claim under the federal employees' compensation act, and having received and accepted compensation, elected his remedy and surrendered any right of action he may have had against the United States under any other act, including the Public Vessels Act, although there allegedly had been no "final award" by the commission.

benefits by the employee,⁷⁴ such as medical services⁷⁵ or hospitalization,⁷⁶ under the act, and, it has been held, even though the commission had no jurisdiction under the act to make the award.⁷⁷

The action is also barred by the employee's failure to reserve common-law rights where, under the statute, reservation is necessary to save them,⁷⁸ by continuing in employment after notice that the employer has accepted the act,⁷⁹ or by an agreement to waive common-law remedies.⁸⁰ An action will not lie notwithstanding the employee's ignorance of the provisions of the compensation act, if there is no fraud or attempt to take advantage of the employee by the employer.⁸¹

An action to recover damages for pain and suffering or disfigurement,⁸² or for failure to furnish reasonably competent medical and surgical services,⁸³ or exemplary damages for gross and reckless negligence,⁸⁴ will not lie on the ground that they were not included in the compensation award.

An election or estoppel from instituting suit for damages is held to arise from application for, and acceptance of, compensation only where they are with the full understanding or knowledge of the applicant;⁸⁵ likewise, an employee appearing in com-

Tort occurring after acceptance

Where, at time of alleged malpractice in an operation on plaintiff in an army hospital the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C.A. § 2671 et seq., was not in effect and the tort for which the damages claimed did not occur until after plaintiff had accepted hospitalization in the army hospital, the mere fact that he accepted hospitalization did not mean that he elected to receive the benefits of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 751 et seq.

Knowledge of available remedies

An injured workman is accorded a "reasonable election" of remedy, within purview of constitutional limitation against denying action for negligence without granting "reasonable election," only when he has knowledge of alternative remedies available and knowledge that law precludes him from pursuing but one of such remedies, and in absence of such knowledge, to seek one remedy does not constitute election to waive another.

U.S.—Taylor v. Hubbell, C.A.Ariz., 188 F.2d 106, certiorari denied 72 S.Ct. 32, 342 U.S. 818, 96 L.Ed. 618.

Void application

If independent contractor who was not entitled to compensation, at time application on his behalf for compensation was filed, was under influence of narcotics and mentally incapable of transacting business, application was void, not merely voidable, and filing of the application did not preclude him from maintaining an independent action for injuries against the general contractor, without repaying, or offering to repay, to the industrial commission the sums received by him from it.

U.S.—Smith v. Price Bros. Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 131 F.2d 750, certiorari denied Price Bros. Co. v. Smith, 63 S.Ct. 560, 318 U.S. 762, 87 L.Ed. 1134.

Knowledge of contents of agreement; fraud

(1) Employee who could read was pensation proceedings without an attorney has been held not to have had a sufficient understanding of the subject, or sufficient knowledge, to support a waiver of his right to assert his claim in a lawsuit.⁸⁶ Under other authority, an employee's unilateral mistake of fact as to the effect of his acceptance of compensation on his common-law remedy does not relieve him of the consequences of his election.⁸⁷

An action for damages is not barred by compensation proceedings under the statute based on fraud in procuring the employee's signature to the application for compensation,⁸⁸ or by proceedings before the compensation commission, or acceptance of compensation, where the employment is not within the act;⁸⁹ or by the mere filing of statutory notice of the injury,⁹⁰ or appearance before the board for the purpose of attacking its jurisdiction,⁹¹ by a futile attempt to obtain an adjudication before the board,⁹² or where the employer has elected not to operate under the act,⁹³ or by compensation proceedings at a time when the employee's remedy is uncertain because of the unsettled condition of the law as to the exclusiveness of the remedy under the compensation act.⁹⁴

Under some authorities, an action for damages is not barred by the institution of compensation proceedings, or the acceptance of compensation, where the injuries are not within the compensation act;⁹⁵ under other authorities, the acceptance of the compensation act by the employee bars his action for injuries even where his injuries are not compensable under the act.⁹⁶

An action is not barred where the award in the compensation case is on appeal and it does not appear that any payments on account of it have been made.⁹⁷ An unsigned statement by the compensation commissioner, and a penciled notation on a estopped to assert that he did not know contents of agreement for payment of full compensation which he signed, or that checks paid to him, and accepted and receipted for by him were compensation payments under compensation law, so that, in absence of fraud, he could not maintain common-law action for damages.

Ky.—Kentucky Road Oiling Co. v. Sharp, 78 S.W.2d 38, 257 Ky. 378.

(2) Statement of officer of employer that employer would take care of employee by paying part of his regular wages did not constitute fraud sufficient to avoid employer's plea of estoppel based on employee's agreement for payment to him of compensation under compensation act; and reliance of employee on such statement was held not evidence of fraud which would bar employer's plea of estoppel.

hearing minute sheet, have been held not to constitute a general finding or award or show that the commission exercised jurisdiction of the claim, so as to bar a common-law action against the employer.⁹⁸

An action for damages is not barred by receipt of money from the compensation commission as salary and not as compensation,⁹⁹ or where, at the time the money was received, the employee was assured that no waiver of his rights was involved,¹ by a finding in a collateral proceeding that payments had been made and accepted under the act,² by accepting payments from the employer's compensation insurer under circumstances not showing an election to accept benefits under the compensation law,³ or by a release of other remedies signed on receipt of money where its effect as an election was not understood at the time by the injured employee, and he was induced to sign in fraud of his rights.⁴ An action at law is not barred by an election to take compensation at an earlier time and under an earlier law where the employment has been intermittent, and no election to take compensation under the existing law is shown,⁵ or by the fact that the employee had applied for insurance as an independent contractor under the act.⁶

Where the compensation act prescribes a form of waiver, action for damages is not barred by a waiver not meeting the statutory requirements.⁷ So, as used in a statute providing that a "claim of compensation" shall be deemed a waiver of the right to proceed at law, the quoted phrase means a claim filed in a tribunal having jurisdiction to hear and determine it,⁸ and not a mere request or demand upon the employer invoking no process of law for its determination or enforcement;⁹ and a claim for compensation is not deemed a waiver of such right unless it is filed in a tribunal having such jurisdiction and is prosecuted to final judgment.¹⁰

Employee's doubt as to compensability or tribunal.

An employee who is in doubt as to whether his injury was sustained in the course of his employment can protect himself against the running of the statute of limitations, and be certain that his claim will be heard in the proper tribunal, by filing both a civil action in court and an application before the compensation commission for compensation.¹¹ An injured employee who is in doubt as to whether his cause of action is one for compensation or for damages, and therefore is in doubt as to which tribunal has jurisdiction, as between the industrial accident commission or a court, may submit the question to either tribunal.¹²

Failure to comply with act. Under an act providing that, where an employer has failed to comply therewith, an injured employee may apply for compensation or sue for damages, an employee who applies for, and receives, a compensation award has made his election of remedies, and is precluded thereby from maintaining an action against his employer even though the latter has failed to comply with the provisions of the act.¹³

Failure to carry compensation insurance. The filing of a claim for compensation does not constitute an election of remedies, so as to preclude an action against the employer, where the claim is filed in the justified, although mistaken, belief that the employer was covered by compensation insurance,¹⁴ or where the compensation proceeding is closed, and there are no further proceedings thereon, after disclosure of the fact that the employer carried no compensation insurance.¹⁵ A noninsured employer who at all times knows that he does not carry compensation insurance and has not relieved himself of so doing as provided by the act is not in a position to invoke the doctrine of estoppel by acceptance of benefits, as a bar to the employee's cause of action for injuries.¹⁶ Under other authority, where an injured employee recovers a judgment in an action against an uninsured employer, and the industrial accident commission later awards him a larger amount than he had recovered in the law action, the employer must satisfy the judgment, notwithstanding he has fully paid the employee the amount of the award by the commission.¹⁷

Self-insurer. The acceptance of payments from an employer who is a self-insurer may bar an employee from suing the employer for damages,¹⁸ whether or not the employer has obtained a release from the employee.¹⁹

ages for an injury has been denied on the ground of election to take compensation under the act even though compensation is denied.²⁰ An employee failing to prosecute a timely appeal from an order of the commission denying compensation has been held to waive the right of action against his employer at common law.²¹

Under other authority, where compensation is denied because the employment is not within the act, the proceedings do not constitute an election of remedies precluding a suit against the employer, at common law, for negligence,²² since there can be no election between remedies unless alternative remedies are available;²³ and the fact that the employee mistook his remedy gives rise to no estoppel against him to maintain the action.²⁴ It has also been held, without reference to election of remedies, that an applicant's proceeding under the compensation act with an unfavorable result does not affect his right to sue the alleged employer at common law for damages,²⁵ and that reversal of an order affirming an award of compensation does not impair whatever right the applicant has in such action.²⁶ An independent contractor is not precluded from maintaining an action for damages by the fact that he mistakenly attempts to collect workmen's compensation.²⁷

Statute not barring action

Where employee's petition for compensation had been dismissed on ground that employment was not one within scope of compensation act, he was not prohibited from bringing common-law action under statute providing that, if employee avails himself of benefit of compensation act by beginning proceeding for compensation, he shall be barred from recovery in an action at common law, but limiting application of statute to specified employments.

Election held not shown

(1) A minor employee's agreement with employer to accept compensation under state compensation act for injuries theretofore sustained by him was not election to operate under act, but merely contractual obligation, not binding on him because of his minority, although approved by compensation board.

U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Broughton, C.A.Ky., 195 F.2d 95, certiorari denied 72 S.Ct. 1047, 343 U.S. 953, 96 L.Ed. 1354.

(2) A girl of about fifteen years would not be deemed to have made an election, so as to preclude her from maintaining a civil action against her employer for her injuries merely because she had signed an application with the industrial commission for, and did receive an award of, compensation, where she was ignorant of her right to maintain the civil action and was persuaded to sign the application without legal advice while still suffering from the injuries on promise of money, education, and other things.

Ohio.—Pisanello v. Polinori, 22 N.E. 2d 92, 60 Ohio App. 422.

(3) In such circumstances, the industrial commission could vacate the award previously granted.

Ohio.—Pisanello v. Polinori, supra.

(4) A daughter under eighteen did not elect to come under compensation act, and hence her father could maintain tort action for injuries received while employed, notwithstanding mother knew of employment prior to injury, where father did not know of employment until after injury, and he had legal responsibility for making election because daughter lived in his household and he was readily available.

La.—Melton v. Fraering Brokerage Co., App., 31 So.2d 884.

No estoppel under voidable agreement

(1) A minor employee, filing no election to operate under state compensation act, was not estopped to deny that he accepted provisions of act by agreeing with his employer to accept compensation thereunder for injuries theretofore sustained.

U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Broughton, C.A.Ky., 195 F.2d 95, certiorari denied 72 S.Ct. 1047, 343 U.S. 953, 96 L.Ed. 1354.

(2) Such agreement was merely voidable and subject to disaffirmance by him on reaching majority, although compensation board approved agreement and final settlement of employee's compensation claim.

Action as avoidance of election

Under compensation act providing that injured workman is barred from recovery in common-law action for negligence by accepting any compensation, action for negligence, brought by minor against employer on reaching majority, was sufficient avoidance of any alleged election while a minor, made by accepting payments under release or final settlement receipt.

N.H.—Johnson v. National Biscuit Co., 69 A.2d 703, 96 N.H. 44.

Discontinuance of compensation proceedings

(2) The definition of the term "employee" contained in the Federal Employees' Compensation Act as including all civil officers and employees of all branches of the government of the United States, should be taken to extend to minors the benefits of the act, but not to deprive them of the protection with which the law surrounds persons below legal age.

Discretion of court

Where release or final settlement receipt was given to employer during minority of injured employee, who received payments thereunder, fact that minor, on reaching majority, brought common-law action in his own right against employer for negligence was a circumstance to be considered by the court, in its discretion, in deciding whether repayment was a condition precedent to bringing the action.

barred by judgment entered by the compensation commission denying him compensation, where such judgment is not authorized by statute.³⁴

The rule permitting suit applies where compensation applied for is refused because the infant is engaged in an occupation not covered by the compensation act;³⁵ and it applies even though the infant's mother and attorney acted for him in the compensation proceedings, where in law they had no authority to represent him.³⁶

Under other authority, suit has been held barred, after election to take compensation, if the infant has conformed to statutory requirements giving him status as an employee sui juris,³⁷ or where the parents of the infant employee impliedly consented to his employment and thereby elected for him to be governed by the compensation law.³⁸ Also, acceptance of the benefits of the compensation act after the employee attains his majority, such acceptance not being induced by fraud, constitutes a binding election to the exclusion of his remedy at common law.³⁹ Under statutes providing for election of his remedy by an infant employee and for payment to him of compensation for his injuries

under the compensation act, a proceeding by an infant employee under the compensation act,⁴⁰ or the acceptance of compensation by him,⁴¹ bars an action for damages; and this may be true even though the infant was employed in violation of law.⁴²

An infant's right to sue at law is not barred by an appearance of a guardian in his behalf before the compensation commission for a ruling which, under the statute, is made a condition precedent to the action at law.⁴³

§ 938. Right to Sue Statutory Employer at Law after Election to Take Compensation from Real Employer

Election to take compensation from the subcontractor, the real employer, bars proceedings against the statutory employer for compensation or for damages in an action at law, unless he has rejected the act.

An election to take compensation from the subcontractor, who is the real employer, bars proceedings against the statutory employer either for compensation under the statute⁴⁴ or to recover damages in an action at law;⁴⁵ but it does not bar a claim for damages against a statutory employer who has rejected the act.⁴⁶

3. ABROGATION OF DEFENSES

§ 939. In General

As a general rule, the workmen's compensation acts provide for the abrogation of the conventional or customary common-law defenses in actions against employers for injuries to employees, where the employers have the option to operate under the act and elect not to do so, or where they are required to operate under the act, or elect to do so, and fail to comply with the requirements of the act or are in default.

Statute held inapplicable

(1) A minor employee who never filed election provided for by state compensation act to operate thereunder was not made sui juris for purposes of such act by provision thereof that minor over sixteen years old shall be considered sui juris for such purposes.

U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Broughton, C.A.Ky., 195 F.2d 95, certiorari denied 72 S.Ct. 1047, 343 U.S. 953, 96 L.Ed. 1354.

(2) The provision is inapplicable to minor employee filing no election to operate under act either before or after sustaining injury in course of his employment, since it means only that minor employee may accept act by filing required statement and thereafter enter into compensation agreement in accordance with provisions of act.

U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Broughton, supra.

(3) Such provision means only that infant is considered sui juris for purposes of carrying out provisions of, coming within, or operating under, act, and not that infant not electing to come under act may contract away, after accident, his rights to damages for injuries resulting from employer's negligence.

Under varying workmen's compensation acts, employers who have the option to operate thereunder and elect not to do so and those required to operate thereunder, or who elect to do so, and fail to comply with their requirements or are in default are deprived of the conventional or customary common-law defenses in actions against them for damages for injuries to employees,⁴⁷ as are also employers who are subject to, and at one time had qualified under, the act, but later withdrew therefrom.⁴⁸ The abrogation of the common-law defenses is dependent on a showing by the employee that he was injured in the course of his employment.⁴⁹ If the person injured was an independent contractor and not an employee, the defendant employer is not precluded from his common-law defenses.⁵⁰

An act will be given effect as depriving a non-accepting employer of the common-law defenses as against an employee's action for injury, although the employee has not elected to accept the act, where the employee has no right of election in advance of a determination by the employer to be governed by the act.⁵¹ A workman who, by agreement with the employer, does not accept the elective compensation provisions of the act is none the less relieved of the rigor of the common-law rule concerning master and servant in the event of his injury or death by accident arising out of, and in the course of, his employment.⁵²

On the other hand, the compensation acts may not abrogate the common-law defenses in actions for injuries to employees against employers who have accepted the act and are operating thereunder,⁵³ at least where the employee has properly rejected the act.⁵⁴ Also, ordinarily employers to whom such compensation acts are not made to apply, or who are exempt therefrom, or not subject thereto are not thereby deprived of such common-law defenses,⁵⁵ nor are employers who cannot for any legal

Knowledge of danger

Where employers were not subject to provisions of workmen's compen-

reason subscribe thereunder,⁵⁶ or employers who were not under the act by operation of law, who filed an election to accept the provisions of the act, and who later filed an election not to accept its benefits,⁵⁷ or where the employment was casual and the employee not protected by the compensation act.⁵⁸

Under some of the compensation acts, the statutory abrogation of common-law defenses in actions for injuries to employees applies only where the employer was under the act by operation of law and elected not to accept its benefits,⁵⁹ although under other acts it applies whether or not the employer comes under the act.⁶⁰ An employer not subject to the act but accepting its provisions gains no immunities thereby, and he is not precluded from his common-law defenses by provisions of the act.⁶¹

The purpose of provisions in workmen's compensation acts abrogating the common-law defenses in actions against employers for injuries to employees is to induce employers who have the option to operate thereunder to do so,⁶² and to place an additional burden on employers required to operate under such acts who fail to provide for the payment of compensation as the act requires.⁶³

Estoppel to rely on act as defense to action on contract. An employer who agrees to give an injured employee lifetime employment in consideration of the employee's releasing him from all liability on account of injuries is estopped to rely on the workmen's compensation act as a defense to the employee's action on the contract.⁶⁴

Limitations period for liabilities under act. A limitations period prescribed by a compensation act for liabilities created by the act may not be pleaded in bar of an action for damages against an employer not complying with the act for injuries to an employee.⁶⁵

§ 940. Contributory Negligence

Under varying workmen's compensation acts, employers who have the option to operate under the act and reject it or elect not to do so and employers required to operate under the act or who elect to do so and who are in default thereunder or fail to comply with its requirements are deprived of the defense of contributory negligence in actions for damages for injuries to employees; but employers who accept the act and are not in default thereunder and employers to whom the act is not applicable are not deprived of the defense in such actions.

Under varying workmen's compensation acts, employers of a class subject to the operation of the act who have not elected to come within the act, or who have rejected it, or have elected not to pay compensation thereunder are not entitled to assert the contributory negligence of the employee as a defense against liability in actions for damages for injuries to employees,⁶⁶ unless, under some acts, the negligence of the employee is willful, as dis-sation act, knowledge of the danger may not be considered in determining the propriety of an order of nonsuit in actions against them under employers' liability act for injuries to employees.

where he does not contribute to the state insurance fund;⁷² or, in more general terms, where the employer fails to comply with the act,⁷³ as by failing to give the required notice to the employee.⁷⁴ Under some acts the defense is not available to an employer whether or not he comes under the act,⁷⁵ but under other acts the statute abrogating the defense applies only to actions for damages where the employer was under the act by operation of law and elected not to accept the benefits of the act.⁷⁶ The negligence of one illegally employed has been held not a bar to a recovery of damages.⁷⁷

On the other hand, an employer who has accepted, or is operating under, a workmen's compensation act may rely on the defense of contributory negligence,⁷⁸ at least where the employee has properly rejected the act,⁷⁹ or has not elected to come under the act,⁸⁰ or has had no opportunity for election,⁸¹ as may, in general terms, an employer who has complied with the requirements of the act.⁸² Also, provisions in compensation acts abrogating the defense of contributory negligence in actions against employers for injuries to employees do not prevent employers to whom the act is not applicable or who do not come within its provisions from relying on the defense in actions against them for injuries to employees.⁸³ In such actions, employers may rely on the defense who are not subject to the compensation act because not engaged in business for pecuniary gain⁸⁴ or because they do not employ the prescribed number of employees;⁸⁵ and under some acts the defense may be relied on by an employer, not under the act by operation of law, who filed an election to accept the provisions of the act, and later filed an election not to accept its benefits.⁸⁶ An out-of-state employer engaged in interstate or foreign commerce has been held entitled to the defense of contributory negligence in an action by an employee who had not elected to operate under the state compensation law for injuries sustained while engaged in a separable intra-state activity.⁸⁷

servants⁸⁸ or farm or ranch laborers;⁸⁹ and it has been stated generally that under certain circumstances an employer sued for damages for injury to an employee not covered by the act may rely on contributory negligence to bar recovery.⁹⁰ An employer who has not elected to come under the act has been held not deprived of this defense where the employee is injured while engaged in casual employment.⁹¹

Under an act making the remedy therein provided exclusive except that, where the injury was caused by the employer's gross negligence or willful misconduct, the employee may claim compensation or maintain an action at law for damages, the latter action would be defeated by the fact that the injury was due to his contributory negligence;⁹² and it has been loosely held with respect to another act that if the employer's rights of defense with respect to contributory negligence are not controlled by a cited section thereof such negligence is an absolute defense.⁹³

Under some acts some care on the part of the employee is demanded,⁹⁴ and where he took no care to avoid an obvious risk the employer is not liable in an action for damages for the resulting injury.⁹⁵

Sole cause of injury. Even though the defense of contributory negligence is abrogated, the fact that a wrongful or negligent act of the employee was the sole proximate cause of his injury or death has been held to constitute a good defense to an action for damages for his injury or death;⁹⁶ and such a defense may be shown by the employer,⁹⁷ since the establishment of such a defense thereby negatives that the injury was caused by the employer's negligence.⁹⁸ In order, however, for the employee's negligence to prevent a recovery, his must have been the only negligence proximately causing the injury and the employer must have been guilty of none.⁹⁹ Where no negligence of the employer is shown, a showing of negligence by the employee does not fall in the category of contributory negligence, but rather it is a showing of primary negligence on the part of the employee.¹ It is a defense to an action for injury to an employee that the employee, without any imminent danger or necessity therefor, left a place of safety and by his negligent conduct caused his own injury, his own intervening negligence thus constituting the sole proximate cause of his injury.²

Mitigation or diminution of damages; comparative negligence. Under some statutes the employer may plead and prove contributory negligence in mitigation or reduction of damages,³ or the damages may be diminished in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the employee.⁴ Under other compensation acts, however, contributory negligence does not cut down or mitigate the damages recoverable,⁵ at least where the employer had rejected the provisions of the workmen's compensation act,⁶ and under one of the acts an employer failing to contribute to the state insurance fund cannot rely on the doctrine of comparative negligence in mitigation of damages.⁷ Still another act has been held not to recognize the doctrine of comparative negligence,⁸ although it has been stated that in certain circumstances an employer sued for damages for injury by an employee not covered by the act may rely on contributory negligence to diminish the amount of damages to be awarded.⁹

Proximate cause. Where the employer is guilty of negligence, he cannot defeat a recovery by claiming that the contributory negligence of plaintiff was the proximate cause of the injury.¹⁰ A provision of a compensation act depriving an employer who violates a statute for the safety of employees of the defense of contributory negligence in an action for injuries to the employee applies only where the violation contributed to the employee's injury.¹¹

compensation act making the defense of contributory negligence unavailable in actions to recover damages for personal injuries or death has no application to an action solely for damage to personal property.¹²

§ 941. Assumption of Risk

As a general rule, provisions in workmen's compensation acts abrogate the defense of assumption of risk in actions for injuries to employees against employers who have not come within the operation of an act which they have the option to come under or who have elected, or are required, to come under the act and are in default thereunder; but it is not abrogated with respect to employers who are operating under the act and are not in default or who are exempt from the application of the act.

In actions against employers for injuries to employees, the defense of assumption of risk by the employee is not, under the ordinary provisions of the compensation acts, open to an employer who has not come within the operation of the act, or is not exempted or precluded from its operation, or has elected not to pay compensation thereunder,¹³ or Federal Employers' Liability Act see Master and Servant § 359.

State employers' liability acts see Master and Servant § 360.
Action based on violation of statute and rule

Negligence of fellow servant
Injuries sustained through negligence of a fellow servant are not injuries due to risks inherent in a given employment.
Tex.—Railway Exp. Agency v. Gray, Civ.App., 211 S.W.2d 1013, error refused no reversible error.
Risks to which barred defense relate
(1) The defense of "assumption of risk" which is not available to employer does not relate to such ordinary and inherent risks of employment as the employer could not avoid in the observance of its duty of care, but to those enhanced, unnecessary risks due to employer's negligence, which negligence and enhancement of risk were known to the employee.
S.D.—Voet v. Lampert Lumber Co., 15 N.W.2d 579, 70 S.D. 142.
(2) The risks which employee does not assume are those which come from master's negligence, of which employee has notice, and which, prior to enactment of workmen's compensation law, because of employee's knowledge thereof and his remaining in the employment after such knowledge, he was held to have assumed, notwithstanding they were produced by employer's negligence.

comply with the act.¹⁸ Under some acts the defense is not available to an employer whether or not he comes under the act,¹⁹ but under other acts the statute abrogating the defense applies only to actions for damages where the employer was under the act by operation of law and elected not to accept its benefits.²⁰ The defense has been held not available where the employment was illegal.²¹

On the other hand, an employer who has accepted the provisions of the act may rely on the defense of assumption of risk by the employee,²² at least where the employee has properly rejected the act,²³ or has not accepted the act,²⁴ or has had no opportunity for election,²⁵ and also where the employer was not subject to the act.²⁶ In such a case, the employee, to recover, must establish that the injury arose from a risk which he did not assume.²⁷ The defense of assumption of risk, however, has been held not available in an action against an employer who had accepted the workmen's compensation act for injury to an employee caused by a defective system of using machinery or an improper system of work adopted by the employer.²⁸ Likewise, an employer of a class not subject to, or exempt from, the act, so far as actions to recover damages are concerned, may rely on such defense, even if he is not a subscriber,²⁹ or where he has not taken affirmative action to elect to come under the act.³⁰

An employer not subject to the act because not engaged in a business for pecuniary gain³¹ or because he does not employ the prescribed number of employees,³² or a municipality acting in its governmental capacity,³³ or employers of persons in particular occupations, such as domestic servants³⁴ or farm or ranch laborers,³⁵ may rely on such defense, as may, it has been held, a nonassenting employer whose employee is injured while engaged in casual employment.³⁶

Under some acts the defense may be relied on by an employer who was not under the act by operation of law, and who filed an election to accept the provisions of the act, and later filed an election not to accept its benefits,³⁷ and under others the denial of the defense is imposed only on those employers who fail to accept the mandatory requirements of the act.³⁸

The restrictions relative to the abrogation of the defense of assumption of risk in actions against employers for injuries to employees cannot be so extended as to deprive the employer of other evidentiary benefits evolving from the same source furnishing a basis for the defense.³⁹

Superior knowledge by the employee of the particular circumstances existing at the time of the injury and his control over the instrumentality causing it may serve to negative the liability of the employer; consideration of the evidence pertaining thereto relates not to the acts of the employee as a bar to his action, but to the bearing they may have on

tion of risk, a distinction is made between voluntary and contractual assumption of risk.⁴⁰ The principle that an employer owes no duty to one entering his employment to alter the obvious condition of his premises or to change the manifest methods of conducting his business, even though safer ones might be devised and that there is therefore no negligence in the employer continuing them,⁴¹ sometimes called "contractual assumption of risk,"⁴² relates to the issue of the employer's negligence,⁴³ and is a limitation on the duty of the employer and a measure by which to determine his negligence,⁴⁴ while the defense of voluntary assumption of risk relates to a risk of injury that comes into existence subsequent to the making of the contract of employment.⁴⁵

It was formerly held under one of the acts, although not under others,⁴⁶ that an employer who failed to come within the act could rely on contractual assumption of risk as a defense, as contrasted with voluntary assumption of risk;⁴⁷ but under subsequent amendments employers who have the option to come under the compensation act and fail to do so are deprived of the defenses of voluntary and contractual assumption of risk,⁴⁸ as also are employers for whom operation under the act is compulsory and who fail to provide compensation thereunder.⁴⁹

Sole cause of injury. The defense of assumption of risk has been held available to an employer eligible to operate under the compensation act but who has not accepted it, where it is the sole cause of the injury or death of the employee.⁵⁰

Simple tool doctrine. Provisions in compensation acts abrogating the defense of assumption of risk in actions against employers for injuries to employees have been held not to abolish the simple tool doctrine and hence not to preclude an employer's reliance on such doctrine as a defense to an action against him for injuries to an employee,⁵¹ but other authority has held that the simple tool doctrine is founded on assumption of risk and does not operate where the defense of assumption of risk is not available as a defense.⁵²

Action for property damage. A provision of a compensation act making the defense of assumed risk unavailable in actions to recover damages for personal injuries or death has no application to an action solely for damages to personal property.⁵³

Continuance of obvious conditions

Employer was held not liable for injuries sustained when a tire falling from a pile struck employee, where the risk of danger from somewhat higher piles was ordinarily incidental to the continuance of obvious conditions.

§ 942. Negligence of Fellow Servant

As a general rule, provisions in workmen's compensation acts abrogate the defense that the injury was due to the negligence of a fellow servant in actions for injuries to employees against employers who have not come within the operation of an act they have the option to come under, or who have elected, or are required, to come under the act and are in default thereunder, but it is not abrogated with respect to employers who are operating under the act and are not in default or who are exempt from its application.

As a general rule, under varying provisions in workmen's compensation acts the defense that the injury was due to the negligence of a fellow servant is abrogated in actions against employers for injuries to employees, where the employer is of a class subject to the operation of the act and has not elected to come within it, or has elected not to pay compensation thereunder,⁵⁴ or where operation under the act is compulsory and the employer failed to provide compensation thereunder,⁵⁵ even, it has been held, where such negligence was the sole cause of injury.⁵⁶ Likewise, the defense is abrogated where the employer is in default,⁵⁷ or is not insured under the act, or has failed to secure the payment of compensation for employees covered by the act,⁵⁸

or, under some acts, where the employer does not contribute to the state insurance fund,⁵⁹ or, in more general terms, where the employer does not comply with the act.⁶⁰

Under some acts the defense is not available to an employer whether or not he comes under the act,⁶¹ although under other acts the statute abrogating the defense applies only to actions for damages where the employer was under the act by operation of law and elected not to accept its benefits.⁶² The abrogation of the defense is dependent on a showing by the employee that he was injured in the course of his employment⁶³ or in the usual course of the employer's business.⁶⁴ The defense may not be abrogated with respect to a nonassenting employer whose employee is injured while engaged in casual employment.⁶⁵ The defense has been held not available where the employment was illegal.⁶⁶

On the other hand, an employer who has accepted the provisions of the act may rely on the defense of the negligence of a fellow servant,⁶⁷ at least where the employee has properly rejected the act,⁶⁸ or has not accepted the act,⁶⁹ or has had no opportunity for election,⁷⁰ and also where the employer is not subject to the act,⁷¹ as may, in general terms, an employer who has complied with the requirements of the act.⁷² Likewise the defense is not abrogated with respect to employers to whom the compensation act is not applicable, or who are exempt therefrom,⁷³ such as employers who do not come within the operation of the act because they do not employ the specified number of employees,⁷⁴ and employers of persons in particular occupations, such as domestic servants⁷⁵ or farm or ranch laborers.⁷⁶ Under some acts the defense may be relied on by an employer who was not under the act by operation of law, and who filed an election to accept the provisions of the act, and later filed an election not to accept its benefits.⁷⁷

In situations in which the defense is abrogated the employer is responsible for the negligence of the employee's fellow servant.⁷⁸ The defense has been held not available in actions for damages for injury or death from silicosis.⁷⁹ compensation act making the defense of negligence of a fellow servant unavailable in actions to recover damages for personal injuries or death has no application to an action solely for damages to personal property.⁸⁰

§ 943. Negligence of Person Whose Duty Is Prescribed by Statute

Under some compensation acts an employer who is not operating thereunder cannot assert the negligence of a person whose duty is prescribed by statute in defense of an action for injury to an employee.

Under some compensation acts an employer who has not come within its operation cannot assert as against the employee's action that the negligence in question was that of one whose duties are prescribed by statute.⁸¹

4. OTHER MATTERS AFFECTING RIGHT OR EXTENT OF RECOVERY

§ 944. Negligence of Employer as Essential to Recovery

Actions for damages for injuries to employees of employers who are not operating under, or have failed to comply with, the workmen's compensation act are essentially actions for negligence; and, except as they have been modified by the act, they are governed by the rules usually applicable to such actions, and negligence on the part of the employer as a proximate part of the injury is essential to a recovery.

In general, an action for damages for injuries to an employee of an employer who is not operating under, or has failed to comply with, the workmen's compensation act is essentially an action for negligence and is governed by the usual rules of law which apply to such actions, except in so far as the act has specifically modified them.⁸² In such an action, actionable fault or breach of duty on the part of the employer is essential to recovery,⁸³ and the mere happening of an accident and resulting injury to the employee are insufficient to establish a breach of the employer's duty.⁸⁴ Hence, except where the act provides otherwise,⁸⁵ negligence on the part of the employer as the proximate cause of the injury is an essential to a recovery by an employee in an action at law, notwithstanding the employer has not come within the provisions of the act, or is in default thereunder.⁸⁶

Care for safety of employees

Action under compensation act by injured employee whose employer has failed to secure the payment of compensation, and action authorized by statute against employer by injured employee who is not covered by the compensation act, are both based on obligation of employer to exercise due care with regard to safety of employees, and the same facts relating to negligence will support a recovery in each, and the parties and the relationship are identical, though the remedies are different.

Tex.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Robinson, 280 S.W.2d 238, 154 Tex. 336—

Provisions in compensation acts abrogating certain defenses in actions against employers for injuries to employees, as discussed supra §§ 939-943, abolish only those defenses and do not create a new right of action where there was none at common law.⁸⁷ They do not, in addition to taking away the specified defenses, establish a statutory right of recovery based only on the fact that the employee sustained injuries by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment,⁸⁸ or relieve the employee of the necessity of establishing a breach of duty by the employer.⁸⁹ Such provisions ordinarily leave only the question whether the employer was negligent and whether that negligence was the proximate cause of the injury,⁹⁰ or the only defense open to the employer is his absence of negligence⁹¹ or that the injury was caused by the sole negligence of the employee.⁹² Thus the employer's negligence as the proximate cause of the employee's injury is all that the employee need establish in order to recover.⁹³

Safe instrumentalities and place of work. An employer who is subject to, or eligible to operate under, a workmen's compensation act and does not operate thereunder, or comply therewith, has the duty, independently of statute, to furnish a reasonably safe place in which to work and reasonably safe tools and instrumentalities with which to work, and he is liable in an action for damages for injuries to employees proximately caused by his violation of Primary inquiry must be directed toward the ascertainment of whether employer was guilty of a breach of duty owed employee, since in absence of negligence of employer, no liability for such injuries can be imposed. Ky.—Home Lumber Co. v. Turley, 139 S.W.2d 435, 282 Ky. 633.

Primary negligence essential

If an employer is not guilty of any primary negligence proximately causing an injury, he is not liable, even if he has failed to comply with the workmen's compensation statutes.

W.Va.—Walls v. McKinney, 81 S.E.2d 901, 139 W.Va. 866.

Malpractice

Injured employee's recovery against employer's insurance carrier on theory that its physicians were guilty of malpractice in treating injured hand is entirely dependent on ability to prove negligence.

Employer's duty not enlarged

The workmen's compensation act does not enlarge the duty of an employer who is not a subscriber; it takes away some of the employer's defenses, but it does not transform conduct theretofore lawful on the part of the employer into negligence. Me.—Palmer v. Inhabitants of Town of Sumner, 177 A. 711, 133 Me. 337, 97 A.L.R. 1292.

Extent of inquiry

Inquiry is confined to acts or omissions of employer.

Sole issue

Issues are confined to negligence and proximate cause.

Ky.—Elcomb Coal Co. v. Coffman, 113 S.W.2d 847, 272 Ky. 93.

On motion for directed verdict

Only question raised by motion for directed verdict of employer not insured under workmen's compensation act is whether there was evidence of employer's negligence contributing to cause injury to employee.

Only defenses

Only defenses available in suit for personal injuries by employee are that employer, its agents, servants or employees, were not guilty of negligence which proximately caused employee's injuries, or that employee himself was guilty of some act which was sole proximate cause of his injuries.

In any particular

If the employer's negligence as the proximate cause of the injury is established in any particular it is sufficient to establish liability.

such duty,⁹⁴ notwithstanding the employee knew of the danger and, with that knowledge, entered into the course of his work,⁹⁵ even though the risk incident to the work is partially the cause of the injury.⁹⁶

The fact, however, that the employer does not operate under the act, or is in default thereunder, does not enlarge his duty with respect to furnishing his employees with safe tools and machines and a place in which to work, and to warn them of dangers not open and obvious;⁹⁷ and he is not an insurer of the safety of his employees or of the safety of their working place or instrumentalities.⁹⁸ Also the abrogation of the common-law defenses does not make the employer an insurer of the safety of his employees.⁹⁹

Neglect of statutory duties. The employee is entitled to enforce any liability arising from the failure to discharge any statutory duty imposed on the employer,¹ such as that requiring the furnishing of a safe place to work,² or the safeguarding of machinery;³ and this is true although the employee has accepted,⁴ or the employer has elected to come under, and the employee has not accepted,⁵ the compensation act.

Notice of injury. A statutory requirement that notice of injury be given to the owner of premises within a specified time after the injury as prerequisite to a right of action for damages has been held not impliedly repealed by the workmen's compensation act.⁶

Presumptions and burden of proof. A consideration of the question of actionable fault or negligence of the employer in an action against him for injury to an employee is complicated by the fact that varying rules exist in the different jurisdictions with respect to the burden of proof and whether or not such negligence is considered an essential element of the cause of action or a matter of defense. Under some acts, although the employer may show the absence of negligence on his part,⁷ the burden is on the plaintiff-employee to prove that the negligence or actionable fault of his employer or of one for

Negligence per se

Where negligence relied on is the failure of employer to furnish a safe place to work, the employer's negligence consists per se in the failure to furnish a safe place, and the employee's assumption of risk or contributory negligence does not bar recovery.

Ky.—Clover Splint Coal Co. v. Lorenz, 110 S.W.2d 457, 270 Ky. 676—Read v. Carter, 98 S.W.2d 464, 266 Ky. 346.

Elements considered in determining safe place

Employee's age, experience, and skill were proper elements for consideration in determining whether employer had failed to furnish employee with a reasonably safe place to work, and reasonably safe appliances and equipment with which to work.

U.S.—Baker v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., C.A.Fla., 212 F.2d 130.

Failure to warn

Where employer knew or should have known that strong soap used in its restaurant had previously caused skin irritation to other employees, it was not necessary, in order to render employer liable for failure to warn inexperienced employee of dangers of using such soap, that a majority of possible employees should be susceptible thereto, but it was enough if a sufficient number were susceptible so that a jury could reasonably say that employer should have known and guarded against the danger.

Purpose of presumption

The statutory presumption that an employer, who is not within the compensation act, is guilty of negligence proximately causing any injury suffered by an employee arising out of, and in the course of, employment, functions as an inducement to employers not to reject the compensation act, and if an employer desires to avoid effect of presumption he has only to insure his liability or be relieved from so doing pursuant to statute.

Iowa.—Casey v. Hansen, 26 N.W.2d 50, 238 Iowa 62.

Presumption as evidence

Statutory presumption that an injury to an employee was a direct result and grew out of the negligence of the employer, which arises from failure of employer to secure payment of workmen's compensation, in itself amounts to evidence, which raises a conflict, and may outweigh positive evidence adduced to rebut it. Cal.—Goss v. Fancoe, 251 P.2d 337, 114 C.A.2d 819—Grady v. Canfield, 49 P.2d 902, 9 C.A.2d 341.

Negligence of fellow servant

In employee's action for injuries against employer who declined to come within compensation act, evidence that employee's injury was caused by negligence of fellow employee supported presumption of employer's negligence, arising from statute, since under statute employer was responsible for negligence of coemployee.

burden of proof to rebut the presumption.¹⁵

This presumption is a rule of substantive law.¹⁶ It is mandatory and takes the place of other evidence, and the court or jury cannot refuse to infer the fact or draw the conclusion until it is overcome by evidence to the contrary more convincing and persuasive.¹⁷ It is a rebuttable presumption of law that obtains until overthrown by proof.¹⁸ It is not an evidentiary presumption that drops out of the picture on the employer producing evidence to rebut it, but it is evidence and may be considered as such along with any other evidence offered by the parties.¹⁹ The statutory presumption of negligence applies only to an action by an employee and does not include an independent contractor who must allege and prove negligence;²⁰ in the case of an independent contractor who is not an employee the presumption that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, one has used due care applies to defendant as well as to plaintiff.²¹

Some compensation acts deprive employers required to operate thereunder who do not do so of the defense that the employee's injury did not result from negligence or other fault of the employer, where the injury arose out of, and in the course of, the employment,²² but employers who have the option to accept the act,²³ or who are exempt from its application,²⁴ are not deprived of such defense. Hence in actions against them for injuries to employees, negligence must be established as a prerequisite to recovery,²⁵ and plaintiff is required to prove the negligence of an employer who had an option to elect whether or not he would come under the act.²⁶

§ 945. Willful Act or Misconduct of Employee

Where the workmen's compensation act so provides, an employer may defend an action against him for injury to an employee on the ground that the injury was caused by the willful act or misconduct of the employee.

What constitutes

(1) "Willful negligence" of employee, precluding his recovery against employer for injury sustained in course of employment, means self-determined, voluntary, intentional negligence.

Mont.—Chancellor v. Hines Motor Supply Co., 69 P.2d 764, 104 Mont. 603.

(2) Provision abrogating the defense of contributory negligence, unless it shall appear that such negligence was willful and with intent to cause the injury, requires the presence of both willful negligence and an intent to cause injury before employee can be barred, and the breaking of a safety rule does not make the injury purposely self-inflicted.

wantonness, however, have been held not to constitute a defense.²⁸ The defense that the employee was negligent cannot be asserted in violation of the statutory prohibition of the defense of contributory negligence by calling his negligence recklessness or wantonness.²⁹

Under a compensation act authorizing an employer to show fraud or misrepresentation by a minor employee as a defense in an action for injury to such employee, it has been held that an employer may set up misrepresentation as to age as a defense to such an action, and that if such defense is proved it makes the defense of contributory negligence available.³⁰

§ 946. Limitation of Recovery or Measure of Damages

The damages obtained in an action against an employer for injuries to an employee should fairly compensate the employee and be in accordance with the rules applicable in actions for negligence at common law.

In general, the damages obtained in an action against an employer for injuries to an employee should fairly compensate the employee and be in accordance with the rules applicable in actions for negligence at common law.³¹ In such an action the employee is not confined to the rate of compensation fixed by the compensation act and may recover an amount in excess of the amount authorized thereunder, as discussed in Damages § 197. The ability of the employee to earn rather than the record of his past earnings is the proper factor on which to compute the impairment of his future earning power.³²

In the absence of a statute authorizing it, an employer cannot set up in mitigation of damages in a tort action by an injured employee indemnity from a collateral source, such as benefits under a workmen's compensation act, even where he has contributed to the fund.³³

A compensation act authorizing an employee injured from the deliberate intention of the employer to recover damages in an action therefor in a sum over and above that to which he is entitled as an award under the act does not limit recovery by the employee in the action to damages in the nature of punitive damages, but he may recover therein both general and punitive damages.³⁴

Under some workmen's compensation acts, compensation payments made to an injured employee who had not elected to come under the act should be credited on the judgment obtained in a tort action for the injury.³⁵ Under an act, however, which provides that where the judgment obtained in an action against an employer for damages for injury to an employee is in excess of the workmen's compensation awarded for such injury the compensation awarded shall be credited on the judgment, if the judgment obtained is less than the compensation awarded it will not be credited on the judgment in satisfaction thereof, even though the award has been fully paid.³⁶

Conditional release. A release of an employer from liability for injuries to an employee on condition that the employer compensate the employee for the injuries he has sustained as provided in the workmen's compensation act may not be relied on in defense of an action by the employee against the employer in the absence of a showing of complete performance of the condition.³⁷

5. PROCEDURE

The applicability of the workmen's compensation statute to an action is not to be determined on the pleadings in the absence of legal certainty.

The compensation act of the state, as part of the law of the land, must be read into every statement of claim;³⁸ but, as to whether a question which arises under it is to be met as a question of pleading or on the trial, in the absence of a legal certainty, on the pleadings, that the act does apply, the question should not be ruled on as a question of pleading.³⁹ The issue of whether the employee has elected to take compensation, barring his right to recover in an action at common law, cannot be determined in the compensation proceeding where the jurisdiction in such proceeding is limited to questions under the compensation feature of the act.⁴⁰ Where there is conflict as to whether plaintiff has elected to proceed under the compensation act so that the common-law remedy is barred, the question should not be determined on motion.⁴¹ In the absence of anything in the pleading or evidence to show that the employee has any remedy under the compensation act of any state, no such defense is available to the employer.⁴²

An employee claiming the right to sue his employer at common law is not required first to obtain a ruling from the compensation authorities that the employer is not protected by the compensation act.⁴³ Under some statutes, where the employer fails to carry insurance as required by the statute, an injured employee may sue his employer without first applying to the compensation authorities to fix the amount of compensation.⁴⁴ Once it clearly appears that the matter is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the compensation authorities, the court should not proceed further.⁴⁵ A common-law action by an employee against an employer for personal injuries is independent of proceedings before the compensation authorities⁴⁶ even though the question of compensation insurance is contested.⁴⁷ The federal court has jurisdiction to determine whether an employee is a member of the crew entitled to maintain a civil suit or is not a member of the crew whose exclusive remedy is under the compensation act.⁴⁸

The compensation board is not a necessary party to a personal injury action by an employee against his employer;⁴⁹ but, under some circumstances, the board may intervene in such action.⁵⁰ An employer who has complied with its contract obligation to furnish his employee with insurance against injury in the course of employment is entitled to be dismissed from the action against the insurer.⁵¹

An employer may be denied the right to bring in as a party the one primarily liable for the injury.⁵²

Employer's death. An employee's cause of action against an uninsured employer survives the employer's death.⁵³

Confusion

Where employee brought action against employer for injuries sustained when foot caught in telephone cord in booth installed and owned by employer, and employer had contract with telephone company obligating company to maintain phones in proper condition when notified in writing, but employer did not claim that company had been notified of need for repairs, and phone company could claim defenses of contributory negligence and assumed risk to which employer was not entitled, confusion would result, and court properly denied motion to join telephone company as a party defendant.

While the complaint in an action for personal injuries need not allege affirmatively that the action is not barred by a statutory provision making compensation proceedings the exclusive remedy, a complaint which on its face shows that it is barred by such statute is insufficient.

While a complaint which shows on its face that the cause of action is within a provision of the compensation law making compensation proceedings the exclusive remedy is insufficient,⁵⁶ ordinarily it is held that the complaint in an action for personal injuries need not allege affirmatively that the claim is not within the statute providing compensation proceedings as the exclusive remedy.⁵⁷ Where an employee is presumptively within the terms of a compensation act depriving him of any other remedy for his injury, on bringing an action for damages against his employer he must allege facts bringing the case without the act⁵⁸ and within an exception, if any.⁵⁹ If no facts are pleaded bringing the employee within the act, it is not necessary

Intentional injury

(1) In action by employee to recover from employer excess of damages over amounts received under workmen's compensation law, allegation that employer had, with deliberate intent to kill or injure plaintiff, failed to require removal of illegally stored explosives and that employer for him to plead any facts bringing the case without the act.⁶⁰

Where the employee relies on a compensation act as depriving the employer of particular defenses, he should allege the facts bringing the case within the act.⁶¹ A complaint alleging that plaintiff was not entitled to relief under the compensation law of another state has been held insufficient in the absence of an allegation that relief was sought of, and refused by, the compensation authorities of such other state.⁶² A petition is not subject to attack by a general demurrer because it contains an erroneous allegation of law.⁶³

Election not to come within act. Where the compensation act does not raise any presumption that the employment is subject to the act, the employee in an action for personal injuries need not allege that the employer has elected not to come within the act;⁶⁴ likewise, where the compensation act in question is a foreign law, the employee need not allege that he has elected not to come within the act;⁶⁵ but where, under the act, an election by the employer and employee to come within the act is presumed, an allegation that the employer⁶⁶ or the employee⁶⁷ has elected not to come within the act is necessary. Where the employee avers that the employer has elected not to come within the operation of the act, it is not necessary that the declaration contain any averment as to the acceptance or rejection of the act by the employee where he has no right of election in case the employer rejects the act.⁶⁸ A petition alleging that the employer has elected not to come within the compensation act, if otherwise proper, is sufficient where the allegation takes the place of an allegation otherwise necessary in an action at common law.⁶⁹

Where the employee has a right to proceed at law unless he has waived his right by filing a claim for compensation under the act, an allegation of filing the statutory notice of claim is not an allegation of filing the claim itself.⁷⁰ The act of a minor in commencing suit against his employer for personal injuries is a sufficient election to proceed by common-law action rather than by compensation proceedings, and the complaint need not contain an allegation as to the election.⁷¹

had, with deliberate intent to injure or kill plaintiff, permitted plaintiff to go into building for purpose of salvaging tools while building was afloat, were not sufficient to allow plaintiff to maintain action.

(2) In action by employee, operator of metal press, against employer to recover damages, in lieu of workmen's compensation, for personal injuries sustained while operating press, allegations that machine was defective and dangerous and that employer was notified of unsafe condition of machine by previous operators and that, despite such warnings, the employer allowed employee to work on machine without knowledge of defect or without safety devices were not sufficient to state cause of action on theory of employer's deliberate intent to injure employee.

pensation act, under which, however, on failure of the employer to comply with its provisions, the employee may sue at law, the employee must allege the noncompliance;⁷² but where the complaint does not allege facts bringing plaintiff within the act he need not allege the failure of the employer to secure payment of compensation as provided by the act;⁷³ and, where plaintiff has brought himself within an exception to the act, his allegation that the employer has failed to insure his liability or deposit any security is immaterial and properly stricken.⁷⁴ Where an employee relies on a compensation act as depriving the employer of particular defenses because of a failure to comply with the conditions to obtain its benefit, he must allege the failure;⁷⁵ on the other hand, under a provision making it optional to sue where the employer has failed to secure the payment of compensation as prescribed, it has been held that the burden is not on the employee to allege the failure.⁷⁶ Where the right of election does not rest alone with the employer, an allegation that the employer has not participated in the state insurance fund does not fix the responsibility on the employer for the legal status of the parties sufficiently to show that he is not entitled to his defenses at common law.⁷⁷

It is not necessary for the complaint to allege that the employer did not carry workmen's compensation insurance where the employer is liable in either

event.⁷⁸ A complaint sufficient to state a cause of action against an uninsured employer has been held sufficient to state a case against an employer not covered by the compensation statute.⁷⁹

Negligence. As discussed supra § 944, negligence or fault on the part of the employer is essential to his liability for personal injuries to an employee, and negligence or fault on the part of the employer must be pleaded by the employee⁸⁰ unless the act creates a presumption of negligence which excuses the necessity of pleading it.⁸¹ Where the employee does not come within the act creating a presumption of negligence on the part of the employer, he must plead as in any other action for negligence to which the act is not applicable.⁸² It has been held that even though the statute provides that proof of injury shall be prima facie evidence of the employer's negligence, or raises a presumption of negligence on the employer's part, plaintiff must allege negligence⁸³ and what the negligence was that caused the injury.⁸⁴

It has been held that the employee need not allege his own due care or absence of contributory negligence.⁸⁵ Where the compensation act deprives the employer of certain defenses, if the allegations of the employee show that the employer is within the terms of the act, it is not necessary for the employee to allege that he is not subject to such defense;⁸⁶ and his pleading is good although his al-

§ 950. — Plea, Answer, or Affidavit of Defense

The contention that compensation proceedings are plaintiff's exclusive remedy is an affirmative defense which may and should be pleaded by the defendant in an action for personal injuries.

The contention that the action does not lie because plaintiff's exclusive remedy is in proceedings under the workmen's compensation act is an affirmative defense⁸⁸ which may and should be pleaded by the defendant.⁸⁹ A defendant is entitled to plead that plaintiff's cause of action falls within a compensation act, notwithstanding plaintiff alleges that the relationship of passenger and carrier existed between himself and defendant at the time of the injury.⁹⁰

On the one hand, it has been held that the employer, in an action at law by the employee for a personal injury, may by plea set up the want of jurisdiction in the court by reason of the fact that the case falls within the provisions of a compensation act;⁹¹ on the other hand, it has been held that it is not proper for the employer to file a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, where the court has jurisdiction of all actions of trespass on the case, but the defense that the case falls within the provision of a compensation act may properly be raised by a plea of the general issue.⁹²

The rule commonly is that where an employer relies on a compensation act in defense, or on a defense which the compensation act has taken away from those not electing to come within it, the burden of pleading the election to come within,⁹³ that he is a subscriber under,⁹⁴ or that he has complied with,⁹⁵ the act is on the employer. Where the employee is presumed not to be bound if the employer elects not to come within the act, an employer relying on the defense that the employee was subject to the act, must allege it.⁹⁶ The claim that the plaintiff has elected to proceed under the compensation act must be pleaded to be available as a defense.⁹⁷

Assumed risk, contributory negligence, and negligence of a fellow employee are usually defensive issues which must be pleaded by the defendant.⁹⁸ Where defendant is required to plead contributory negligence as a defense, it has been held that an employer must plead that he is not within a compensation act depriving certain employers of that defense.⁹⁹ Where the compensation act creates a pre-

In action at law by employee against employer to recover for non-compensable disease resulting from employer's alleged negligence in failure to provide a safe place to work, it is not essential to a good complaint to mention occupational diseases act, and the pleading of its terms does not constitute a good answer.

sumption of negligence on the part of the employer, he has the burden of pleading as a defense, or in mitigation of damages, whatever he must prove to overcome the presumption or to mitigate the damages.¹

Where a suit is founded on an exception under the compensation act,² or is not founded on the act,³ a plea founded on the act, or its general application, is insufficient. An answer which does not sufficiently allege that the employment is within the compensation act is insufficient.⁴ Although the statute abrogates the defense of contributory negligence, defendant may properly plead that plaintiff's negligence was the sole cause of his injury.⁵ A defense which fails to allege all of the facts necessary to show that plaintiff is entitled to compensation solely under the compensation law is insufficient and may be stricken.⁶

An allegation of the declaration or complaint that the defendant is an employer subject to the provisions of the compensation act,⁷ or an employer who has elected not to come within the act,⁸ is admitted, if not properly denied.

Surplusage. An averment by the employer that he is governed by a compensation act may be rejected as surplusage where it amounts to an averment of a legal impossibility.⁹

Inconsistent pleas. Pleas that plaintiff is within the operation of a compensation act and that he was negligent are not inconsistent.¹⁰

§ 951. — Reply

Where the compensation act is set up as a defense, its inapplicability may be set up by a reply.

If the compensation act is set up as a defense, it may be countered by a reply,¹¹ denying, for example, that the parties have elected to be bound by the act,¹² or alleging that the case is within an exception.¹³ Where the defense is one which an employer who has not elected to come within the act is deprived of, an employee, relying on the act and failing to plead it otherwise, must allege the application of the act in his reply.¹⁴ Where the defense is that plaintiff accepted compensation, and the reply alleges that such settlement was fraudulent, the reply may be treated as a bill in equity to set aside the settlement.¹⁵

§ 952. — Amendments and Supplemental Pleadings

In a proper case, the pleadings may be amended.

Unless barred by the lapse of time,¹⁶ an amendment of the pleading of an injured employee to show liability of the employer under the compensation act,¹⁷ or to show that the employer was not bound by the act,¹⁸ may be proper. Where the original fendant's fraud was not a "defense," but by it plaintiff sought affirmative relief by way of cancellation, which could only be obtained in equity.

petition in an action by an employee stated facts sufficient to show a cause of action under the compensation act, an amendment merely asking relief thereunder in the alternative is proper.¹⁹ The answer may be amended to show workmen's compensation proceedings as a defense to the action.²⁰

Refusal to permit an amendment is not error where such amendment is not necessary and where its refusal does not prejudice the applicant,²¹ as where it is sought to amend the complaint to add a cause of action based on a statute which is not applicable.²² Refusal to permit an amendment of the complaint to correct an allegation that plaintiff was an employee of the defendant has been held error.²³

§ 953. — Demurrer or Exception

A complaint is subject to a demurrer where it appears on its face that plaintiff's exclusive remedy is by way of compensation proceedings.

Where it appears from the face of the complaint or petition for damages for personal injuries that plaintiff's sole remedy is by way of compensation proceedings, the petition or complaint is subject to a demurrer or motion to dismiss;²⁴ but a complaint is not subject to dismissal or to a general demurrer where it does not appear from the complaint as a matter of law that the claim is exclusively one for compensation proceedings.²⁵ Where the practice is authorized by statute, the employer, without answering the averments of fact in the statement of claim, may set up by his affidavit of defense the claim that the compensation act provides the sole remedy.²⁶ Although an injured employee may have a right to compensation under a compensation act, his pleading is not subject to demurrer²⁷ or exception of no cause of action²⁸ for failure to allege that he has not received compensation under the statute.

A demurrer to an answer setting up the workmen's compensation act is properly overruled where the complaint shows that the claim falls within the operation of the act.²⁹

In accordance with general rules, allegations of fact,³⁰ but not of law,³¹ are treated as admitted on a demurrer.

§ 954. — Issues, Proof, and Variance

General rules as to issues, proof, and variance apply in actions for personal injuries by an employee against his employer.

General rules as to issues, proof, and variance apply in an action by an employee against his employer for personal injuries.³² Inasmuch as every fact material to the employee's cause of action, if put in issue, must be proved, an allegation that the employee was exercising due care,³³ or that the employer elected not to come within,³⁴ or failed to comply with,³⁵ the compensation act, if put in issue, must be proved by plaintiff; but plaintiff need not prove what is not put in issue by a proper denial³⁶ or that which is mere surplusage with respect to his action.³⁷

A plea of the general issue by the employer puts in issue every fact necessary to sustain the employee's action, including an allegation by the employee that he was exercising due care,³⁸ and an allegation that the employer had elected not to come within the compensation act.³⁹ A general denial by the employer likewise puts in issue every material allegation of the employee's complaint, including an allegation that the employer failed to comply with the act.⁴⁰ An averment by the employee which is neither admitted nor proved is unavailing;⁴¹ and a defense which the employer might set up under the plea of the general issue, but does not, is waived.⁴²

Plaintiff must plead and prove negligence or fault on the part of the employer proximately causing his injury.⁴³ Ordinarily it is for defendant to plead and prove that plaintiff's exclusive remedy is by way of compensation proceedings;⁴⁴ but it has been held that, where the complaint alleges an employer-employee relationship, plaintiff must allege and prove that the action is not within the provision of the statute making compensation proceedings the exclusive remedy.⁴⁵

In an action at common law for injuries received by a workman, where the evidence makes out a case, not at common law but under the compensation act, if the charge of variance is properly raised by the employer it is fatal to the action.⁴⁶ An allegation by the employee that the employer elected not to come within the compensation act is not varied by proof which is consistent with such non-election⁴⁷ or is inconsistent as to an immaterial part of the allegation which may be rejected as mere surplusage;⁴⁸ but where the employee did not allege that the employer elected not to come within a compensation act proof of the non-election would be at variance with the pleading.⁴⁹

It has been held that it is for plaintiff to allege and prove that his employer did not carry compensation insurance.⁵⁰ Pleading and proof that the employer did not carry workmen's compensation insurance has been held improper where the employer does not plead contributory negligence, negligence of a fellow servant, or assumption of risk.⁵¹

The fact that the complaint fails to allege an agreement to pay for the services does not render it insufficient to support evidence of an employee-employer relationship.⁵²

ments of his case, such as that his injury was the proximate result of the employer's negligence or fault.

In accordance with general rules governing actions by employees against their employers to recover damages for injuries, where, notwithstanding the existence of a compensation statute, an employee chooses to bring an action at law against his employer for damages, he has the burden of proving his case by a preponderance of evidence.⁵³ Where plaintiff seeks to escape the application of a provision of the compensation law making compensation proceedings the exclusive remedy, he must show that he is within an exception to the statute.⁵⁴

Where a compensation act provides that an injured employee, instead of applying for compensation, may at his option sue at law, where certain specified elements coexist, the employee must prove that the elements specified actually coexist in the particular case.⁵⁵ Where the employee's right to sue at law depends upon his having first made an application for compensation, a plaintiff showing that he has first applied for compensation under the act must prove the facts bringing him within the exceptions authorizing a suit at law.⁵⁶ Where the employer is presumed to accept the act, the employee bringing an action at law for damages on the theory that the employer has rejected the act must prove that the employer has rejected the act,⁵⁷ or has failed to comply with the provisions thereof,⁵⁸ as by failing to keep in force compensation insurance.⁵⁹

Where the employer has accepted the provisions of the compensation act, the burden is on the employee to show that the doctrine of voluntary assumption of risk⁶⁰ or contributory negligence⁶¹ is inapplicable to the case.

Where the employer relies on particular matters of defense, in order to defeat the action the employer has the burden of establishing those matters.⁶² Ordinarily the burden is on defendant to prove the defense that compensation proceedings are plaintiff's exclusive remedy.⁶³ Where the employer relies on the defense that the employee has elected to accept

Order of proof

In negligence action against an employer and a supplier of defective oil for personal injuries, burden was not on defendants to establish that employee's action was under workmen's compensation act, and not under common law, until after employee had made out a prima facie case of liability for common-law negligence.

Tenn.—Watson v. Borg-Warner Corp., 228 S.W.2d 1011, 190 Tenn. 209.

Compensation law of another state

Where employer relied on workmen's compensation act of Missouri to relieve him from common-law liability to employee for injuries sustained in Ohio allegedly as result of employer's negligence, employer had burden of establishing that plaintiff compensation, rather than to proceed at law, the burden is on the employer to prove such election.⁶⁴ An employer relying on the defense of contributory negligence has been held to have the burden of proving that the case is not within the statute depriving him of such defense.⁶⁵

Where it is presumed that the employer authorized the execution and presentation of certain writings in which it was stated that the employer rejected the compensation act, the burden of proving that the writings were not authorized is on the employer.⁶⁶ An employer who has rejected the compensation act may have, in an action by the employee at law, the burden of rebutting a prima facie case made by the employee.⁶⁷ Where there is a presumption that an employer's rejection of a compensation act, prior to the time of an accident, continues down to the time of the accident in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is held that the burden of proving that the rejection of the act was waived is on the employer.⁶⁸

personal injuries.⁶⁹ Where the injuries on which the action is based arise out of peculiar conditions of the employment, it may be presumed that those conditions existed with the permission of the employer so as to constitute the injury one "arising out of and in the course of" employment, and accordingly an injury compensable under the act rather than an injury for which damages may be sought in an action at law.⁷⁰ The presumption that another person working on the premises of the employer is another employee goes out of the case where positive evidence that he is not an employee is presented.⁷¹

It has been held that there is no presumption that the workmen's compensation statute applies;⁷² but it has also been held that it is presumed that such statute applies where there is an employer-employee relationship⁷³ and the trade or business is within the statute.⁷⁴

An election by the parties to accept the compensation act has been presumed,⁷⁵ but there is author-

In Georgia

(1) Where pleadings or issues make it appear affirmatively that employer and employee would ordinarily come under workmen's compensation law, there is a presumption that they come under its exclusive remedies; but where it appears that employer and employee are or are not an employer and employee as defined in workmen's compensation law, and nothing else appears to indicate that action is one coming under its provisions, there is no presumption which plaintiff must negative in order to maintain an action not covered by the law.

Ga.—Flint Elec. Membership Corp. v. Posey, 51 S.E.2d 869, 73 Ga.App. 597.

(2) Mere existence of employer-employee relationship raises no presumption that the parties are subject to the workmen's compensation act. Ga.—Reid v. Lummus Cotton Gin Co., 197 S.E. 904, 58 Ga.App. 184.

W.Va.—Ferguson v. Pinson, 50 S.E. 2d 476, 131 W.Va. 691.

Independent contractor

Where the industrial commission found that plaintiff was an independent contractor, no appeal was taken, and, in an action for injuries, there was no evidence that the parties stood in the relationship of master and servant or employer and employee, the provision of the workmen's compensation act that every employer and employee shall be presumed to have accepted the provisions of that act had no application. Election by employee

(1) It may be presumed under certain evidence that the employee has accepted the act.

Ky.—Kentucky Road Oiling Co. v. Sharp, 50 S.W.2d 535, 244 Ky. 157. 71 C.J. p 1503 note 85.

(2) The failure of Iowa employer to carry compensation insurance as required by compensation act gave injured employee an election to proceed under the act or to collect damages at common law, but in absence of filing of notice of election within required time, an election by the employee to proceed under the act would be presumed by law.

U.S.—Severson v. Hanford Tri-State Airlines, C.C.A.Minn., 105 F.2d 622, ity that such an election will not be presumed.⁷⁶ The employer's acceptance of a compensation act is not to be presumed from the employer's failure to file with the compensation commission, prior to the accident, notice that the employer would not be bound by the act, where it appears that the compensation commission did not come into existence until after the time of the accident.⁷⁷ Where there is evidence that certain documents were accepted by a state officer as indicating the election of the employer not to come within the act, it may be presumed that the execution and the presentation of such documents were authorized by the employer,⁷⁸ and, where there is evidence to the effect that the employer had, prior to the time that the accident occurred, excepted itself from the operation of the act, it may be presumed that the exception continued to the time that the injury was sustained.⁷⁹

It may be presumed that the employer has complied with the provisions of the compensation law.⁸⁰ Provisions of an existing compensation statute requiring the employer "to secure the payment of compensation" have been held to give rise to the presumption that the employer has complied with this statutory duty.⁸¹

Age

In action for injuries against defendant covered by the workmen's compensation act where plaintiff sought to avoid the act on ground that he was under sixteen years of age at the time of the accident, testimony of plaintiff as to his own age and as to his previous statements on the same subject was admissible.

N.D.—Schnoor v. Meinecke, 40 N.W. 2d 803, 77 N.D. 96.

Number of employees

In employee's personal injury action against employer which allegedly carried no compensation insurance, statements elicited from employee's witnesses that they had worked for employer at and prior to time of injury, admittedly showing that employer had requisite number of employees to render it eligible to carry such insurance, were admissible.

§ 957. — Admissibility

Competent evidence, relevant to a material issue, is admissible in a civil suit for damages for personal injuries by an employee against an employer in a jurisdiction where there is a workmen's compensation statute.

In accordance with the rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions generally, competent evidence, relevant to a material issue, is admissible in a common-law action by an employee for personal injuries against an employer in a jurisdiction where there is a workmen's compensation statute,⁸² and evidence which is not competent, relevant, and material is not admissible.⁸³ Evidence which is inadmissible for some purposes may be admissible for other purposes.⁸⁴

Evidence which is competent and material on the issue of negligence may be admissible on behalf of the employer,⁸⁵ and competent evidence, tending to show that the particular case is governed by provisions of the compensation act, entitling the employee to compensation rather than to recover damages at law, is admissible.⁸⁶ Accident reports of an employer may not, however, be admissible in evidence as admissions of, and against, the employer,⁸⁷ and evidence relating to the employer's rejection of the compensation act may not be admissible for the purpose of indicating the scope and meaning of the act itself.⁸⁸

Union contract

In personal injury action by union musician employed at restaurant where defendant restaurant claimed that plaintiff was its employee and was limited to claim under workmen's compensation act, a contract purporting to be a contract of employment negotiated and executed by or for a union representing employees was admissible irrespective of whether it had been signed by plaintiff.

Evidence that the employer's failure to carry insurance was not deliberate is properly rejected as immaterial.⁸⁹ When the employer fails to insure against liability to pay compensation to its employees under the act, evidence as to the efforts made by the employer to take out insurance is inadmissible,⁹⁰ as is evidence that the employer has been previously acquitted when proceeded against under the penal provisions of the compensation act.⁹¹ Where contributory negligence is not a defense, evidence to show such negligence is not ad-

§ 958. — Weight and Sufficiency

General rules as to weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in actions by employees for personal injuries.

General rules are applicable to questions of the weight and sufficiency of evidence where an employee sues at law to recover damages for injuries rather than proceeding for compensation under the statute.⁹³ The degree of proof required to show that defendant has rejected the compensation act has been held to be the same as would be required by defendant to defeat liability for compensation in proceedings therefor.⁹⁴

§ 959. Trial

General rules as to trial apply.

General rules as to trial apply in actions for personal injuries by an employee against his employer in jurisdictions where there is a workmen's compensation statute.⁹⁶ Where the pleadings interject an equitable issue, the order of procedure rests in the discretion of the trial court.⁹⁷

§ 960. — Questions of Law and Fact

Questions of law are for the court and questions of fact are for the jury in actions for personal injuries by an employee against his employer in a jurisdiction where there is a workmen's compensation statute.

In accordance with the rules applicable in civil actions generally, the court, in an action by an employee against the employer for damages sustained in the course of the employment, should overrule a motion for a nonsuit,⁹⁸ or a motion to direct a verdict in favor of the employer⁹⁹ and submit the case to the jury, where the evidence, considered in a light most favorable to the employee, tends to support his action. If, however, the employee has failed to adduce any proof in support of one of the essential allegations of the complaint the motion should be granted.¹

The meaning of a term used in the statute is a question of law for the court.² The extent and validity of an election not to accept the provisions of a foreign workmen's compensation law are for the court and not for the jury,³ and where the statute states the requirements of the notices of acceptance to be posted in the employer's place of business it is for the court to determine whether the notices filed comply therewith.⁴

Where the evidence as to an issue is not conflicting and is reasonably susceptible of but one inference, the question is one of law for the court.⁵

Jurisdiction of commission

In employee's action against employer for injuries allegedly due to occupational disease, where the evidence established that there had been a hearing on employee's claim for injuries before the workmen's compensation commission, jurisdiction of the commission over the proceeding instituted by employee should have been decided on the record and findings of the commission, rather than on the evidence presented in the action.

Admission

(1) In common-law action for negligence, remark of defendant's counsel in his opening statement that there was not any accident, if constituting an admission that there was no accident within the meaning of the compensation act, did not authorize plaintiff's maintenance of the common-law action where the admission was not accepted or acted upon and plaintiff proceeded to prove that there was an accident within the compensation act, so that he made no case at common law.

Mo.—McKay v. Delico Meat Products Co., 174 S.W.2d 149, 351 Mo. 876.

(2) Where at opening of the trial the defendant's counsel admitted that the defendant employed more than three employees and was not a subscriber to workmen's compensation law and requested that he be allowed to strike from his answer any allegations which would require proof by plaintiff that defendant was not such a subscriber, the better practice was to keep from the jury all reference to such matter.

Sell v. Fahs, Com.Pl., 55 Montg. Co. 197.

Thus, where the evidence is conclusive, the court may properly charge that a particular case falls within the terms of a compensation act.⁶

Questions of fact are for the jury.⁷ Where the evidence is conflicting or such that men's minds might reasonably differ as to the inference to be drawn therefrom, it is for the jury to determine the applicability of the Workmen's Compensation Act,⁸ whether the employee's exclusive remedy is in compensation proceedings,⁹ waiver or election by the employee,¹⁰ whether or not an employer-employee relationship existed,¹¹ whether the injury arose out of, and in the course of, employment,¹² the nature of the employment, whether casual or permanent,¹³ the sufficiency of the posting of the employer's election to comply with the workmen's compensation act,¹⁴ the negligence of the employee,¹⁵ or the negligence of the employer and its causal connection with the employee's injury.¹⁶

It is usually a question for the jury whether presumptions in favor of the employee have been controverted and overcome.¹⁷

§ 961. — Instructions

General rules as to instructions apply in actions by an employee against his employer for personal injuries in jurisdictions where there is a workmen's compensation statute.

General rules as to instructions in civil actions apply as to instructions in actions for personal injuries by employees against employers in jurisdictions where there is a workmen's compensation statute.¹⁸ The instructions must be considered as a whole,¹⁹ and must not be misleading or confusing.²⁰ Matter covered by other instructions need not be repeated.²¹ The instructions should cover adequately all of the issues in the case,²² but should be confined to the issues raised by the pleadings.²³ The instructions should not set out common-law defenses prohibited defendant by the compensation act;²⁴ but, where the situation is such that the common-law defenses are available to defendant, proper instructions thereon should be given.²⁵

The instructions must state the law correctly and adequately.²⁶

It is proper to instruct the jury relative to pertinent portions of the workmen's compensation law²⁷ and as to the evidence which may be considered in determining a particular issue.²⁸ Where the employee's attempt to recover in an action at law, if unsuccessful, will not defeat his right to compensation under the compensation act, the employer is entitled to an instruction to that effect.²⁹ If instructions on particular phases of the issues are desired, they should be requested.³⁰ A requested instruction which does not state the law correctly is properly refused.³¹

§ 962. — Verdict, Findings and Conclusions

General rules as to verdicts and findings apply in an employee's action for personal injuries.

General rules apply as to verdicts and findings.³² In an action tried to the court without a jury, findings of fact and conclusions of law must conform to, and be supported by, the pleadings.³³ Where an employer has rejected the act, a general finding for defendant makes special findings on assumption of risk and contributory negligence unnecessary.³⁴ Inconsistent findings will not support a judgment.³⁵

General rules apply on review of personal injury actions by employees against employers in jurisdictions where there is a workmen's compensation statute.

General rules apply on review of actions by employees against employers for personal injuries in jurisdictions where there is a workmen's compensation statute.³⁷ The remedy of a party adversely affected by errors committed in the trial of an action by an employee to recover damages for a personal injury from an employer may be by appeal.³⁸ An order determining the defense that plaintiff's sole remedy is under the compensation statute is appealable.³⁹ An order overruling a demurrer to a reply which alleged that defendant was deprived of the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence by the workmen's compensation act has been held to be appealable.⁴⁰

Questions not properly raised and reserved in the court below cannot be considered for the first time on review.⁴¹ A contention not made in the lower court may not be raised for the first time on appeal.⁴² However, the court may of its own motion consider a jurisdictional question.⁴³ An adjudication by the compensation board which is not pleaded or proved will not be considered.⁴⁴ Appellant cannot complain of a ruling favorable to him⁴⁵ or which he requested or invited.⁴⁶

Ordinarily questions of fact will not be reviewed and a finding of fact will not be disturbed on review where it is supported by the evidence.⁴⁷ While

General statute as to appeals

Appealability of order, in wrongful death action, disposing of defense asserted by attorney general in behalf of state industrial accident commission, to effect that plaintiff's sole remedy was under workmen's compensation law, is not governed by general statute authorizing appeals, and, accordingly, fact that wrongful death action was still pending would not preclude allowance of appeal by commission from adverse ruling. Double recovery

Where independent proceedings before industrial accident commission on claim of employee of uninsured employer for compensation terminated subsequent to entry of judgment for employee in action against employer for same injury, merits of employer's objection to successive awards for employee in damage action and in compensation proceedings as being a double recovery would not be reviewed on employer's appeal contesting validity of judgment in damage action.

Constitutionality of statute

Where question of constitutionality of statute making every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, including minors, subject to workmen's compensation act was neither presented to the trial court nor passed upon by it, issue of constitutionality of statute would not be considered on appeal.

"Seaman" or "harbor worker"

(1) When injured employee sues under Jones Act, question whether he is to be classified as a "seaman," or as a "harbor worker" covered by longshoremen's compensation act, presents issues of fact for determination by jury or the court.

U.S.—Bowen v. Shamrock Towing Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 139 F.2d 674—Schantz v. American Dredging Co., C.C.A.Pa., 138 F.2d 534.

(2) Where reasonable minds might reasonably differ as to whether employee injured on navigable waters and in scope of his employment was a member of the crew so as to be excluded from operation of the longshoremen's compensation act or was a maritime worker within the ambit of that act was a question of fact for the trier of the facts.

U.S.—Smrekar v. Bay & River Nav. Co., supra.

(3) Conclusion of judge, jury, or commissioner that injured employee is not a master or member of a crew

the appellate court will not weigh the evidence,⁴⁸ it will consider whether there is substantial evidence in support of the judgment.⁴⁹ Where the facts are undisputed, the reviewing court may determine as a matter of law whether plaintiff was an employee or an independent contractor.⁵⁰ A judgment which implies a finding of fact must stand on appeal unless the evidence in support of the finding is insufficient to sustain it.⁵¹ A finding that defendant was a subscriber under a compensation act cannot be reviewed where the evidence on which it is based is not reported,⁵² nor may the sufficiency of a document admitted in evidence below be reviewed as to formal matters where the exhibit is not shown in the abstract.⁵³

The judgment will be reversed for prejudicial error.⁵⁴ An erroneous instruction requires reversal where it is impossible to tell whether it affected a verdict reached on sharply conflicting evidence.⁵⁵

In accordance with general rules, the judgment will not be reversed for harmless error⁵⁶ with respect to the admission or exclusion of evidence,⁵⁷ the argument of counsel,⁵⁸ or instructions.⁵⁹ Error, if any, in striking a defense based on a workmen's compensation act is harmless where the evidence is such that such defense must necessarily fail,⁶⁰ and any error committed in admitting evidence to prove a fact, which the party against whom the evidence is offered admits to be true, is harmless and the error is not subject to review.⁶¹

The admission of evidence which was not required in support of any allegation of the party who introduced the evidence, although erroneous, may be harmless.⁶² In an injured servant's action against his employer who had not accepted the workmen's compensation act, any error in the unnecessary allegations by plaintiff that defendant employed large numbers of employees, and that it was not a subscriber to the act, is harmless.⁶³ Where a declaration contains a count on a common-law cause of action and a count alleging that defendant had elected not to be governed by a compensation act, defendant is not prejudiced by the action of the trial court in permitting both counts to be submitted to the jury and in allowing the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence to be submitted as to the first count and excluded as to the second.⁶⁴ Where the employee, if he had any right to maintain an action at law at all, was immune to the common-law defenses of contributory negligence, assumed risks and the fellow servant rule, the employer was not harmed by the court's refusal to instruct that it was a "common law action."⁶⁵ Under a compensation act providing that, where an employer does not insure its employees, in an action to recover damages for injuries sustained by such employees it shall not be a defense that the employee has assumed the risk of the injury, an instruction to the effect that plaintiff assumed certain risks was harmless as to defendant,⁶⁶ and where the case was tried below on the erroneous theory, but with within provision of longshoremen's act excepting from its operation member of a crew of any vessel is not binding upon reviewing court if the basic facts competently found by judge, jury, or commissioner rightly call for a different conclusion.

Dual employment

Where employee was in employ of two companies, next of kin's exclusive remedy for employee's death resulting from negligence of another employee of one company was by claim under compensation act.

N.J.—Scott v. Public Service Interstate Transp. Co., 70 A.2d 882, 6 N.J.Super. 226.

Employee of state or subdivision of state

(1) Workmen's compensation was exclusive remedy of claimant for wrongful death of seaman who was fatally injured in an accident on state derrick barge used in repair of state canal system.

N.Y.—Maloney v. State, 165 N.Y.S.2d 465, 144 N.E.2d 364, 3 N.Y.2d 356.

(2) Administratrix of estate of city employee, killed in course of his duties as alleged result of another city employee's negligence, is limited to recovery of compensation for his death under workmen's compensation law and has no right to maintain action against city to recover damages for his wrongful death.

N.Y.—De Giuseppe v. City of New York, 79 N.Y.S.2d 163, 273 App.Div. 1010, appeal denied 79 N.Y.S.2d 910, 274 App.Div. 790.

(3) Volunteer fireman, who, while responding to town's call, died from under⁷² a compensation act which excludes remedies other than those given by the act, at least where the employer has fully complied with the act.⁷³ The remedies provided by the act may exclude an action for the death of the employee, even though the employer may not be required to pay compensation for the death under the act because it occurred more than a specified period after the injury.⁷⁴

Where a death act limits the right of action to those cases in which the person injured would have had a right of action for damages if death had not ensued, the personal representatives of a deceased employee cannot sue thereunder where, if he had lived, the employee would have been compelled to resort to the compensation act.⁷⁵ So, where the remedy under the act is intended as a substitute for common-law and other statutory remedies and permits the employee to retain only rights given by the common law by notice claiming such rights, the view has been taken that a right of action for death may not so be retained since such right is exclusively the creature of statute.⁷⁶

Further, where a compensation act is compulsory and provides that the system of compensation established shall be exclusive of all other remedies, it takes away any existing right to maintain an action for wrongful death,⁷⁷ in the absence of the employer's failure to secure the payment of compensation as required by the act.⁷⁸

Federal Employees' Compensation Act. The view has been taken that the Federal Employees' Compensation Act does not provide an exclusive remedy so as to prevent an action by the personal representative of a deceased railroad employee against the director general of railroads for the death of such employee which occurred while the railroad in question was being operated under federal control.⁷⁹ It has been held, however, that the Federal Employees' Compensation Act excludes any other remedy against the United States under federal tort liability statutes.⁸⁰

Remedy sought in courts of another jurisdiction. Where the provision of the compensation act of a state in which the employee's injury occurs, that makes the remedy exclusive, does not create a new cause of action for wrongful death, the remedy under the act has been regarded as cumulative and not exclusive where the remedy is sought in another jurisdiction.⁸¹ A compensation act of the state where the contract of employment was made which otherwise applies to the employer and the employee may preclude an action for the death of the employee under the law of another jurisdiction.⁸² In respect of a claim for damages to which a state act does not apply, the right to pursue a remedy in an admiralty court of the United States has been recognized where the matter is otherwise within the jurisdiction of that court.⁸³

In Oklahoma. Under an amendment to the constitutional provision that the right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated providing that the legislature may provide compensation for death under the workmen's compensation law, such compensation to be exclusive, and under provisions of the compensation act pursuant thereto providing for death benefits payable to the dependents of a deceased employee, the personal representative of an employee who left no dependents has no right of action for pain and suffering of the employee.⁸⁴ Under the constitutional provision as it stood prior to amendment, the compensation act provided that no right of action for the recovery of damages for injuries resulting in death was intended to be denied or affected,⁸⁵ and it was held that the employee's personal representative was entitled to maintain an action for death on the theory that it resulted from the employer's wrongful act or omission, even though the employee had recovered workmen's compensation;⁸⁶ it was further held that recovery might be had for pain and suffering of the deceased employee when no award of compensation had been made to him before his death,⁸⁷ but not where such an award had been made before his death.⁸⁸

b. Death of Minor Employee

An action against the employer for the death of a minor may not be maintained, even though the employment was illegal, where the compensation act provides the exclusive remedy.

A general statute giving a right of action to a parent for the death of a minor child has been construed in the light of subsequent legislation embodied in the workmen's compensation act making exclusive the remedy under the act for death,⁸⁹ and does not give a right of action where the employee is one who is not excluded from the operation of the compensation act.⁹⁰ Some compensation acts making the remedies therein given exclusive preclude an action for damages for the death of a minor, even though the minor was illegally employed,⁹¹ where the minor was authorized to elect and did elect to accept the provisions of the act,⁹² or failed to elect not to be bound by the compensation plan adopted by the employer.⁹³

Where, however, the right to elect in respect of a minor employee is, under the act, in the parent, the right of a parent to sue has been recognized where the parent had no knowledge of the employment of such employee before his death.⁹⁴ Where it is presumed that the employer and employee are bound by the act in the absence of an election to the contrary, which election shall be made by the parent or tutor of a minor, it has been held that an action by the parent is precluded in the absence of an election, even though the employment was illegal and without the knowledge or consent of the parents.⁹⁵

In at least one jurisdiction it has been held that an action for the death of an illegally employed minor by a parent is not precluded by the workmen's compensation act.⁹⁶

c. Employer, Employee, or Employment Not within Act

Where the employer, the employee, or the employment is not covered by the compensation act, an action against the employer for the death of the employee may be maintained.

Where an employee is one of a class of employees excepted from the compensation act,⁹⁷ or where an employer is not within the classes of employers who are subject to the act,⁹⁸ an action for the death of an employee is not precluded. However, even though the deceased person was not within the class of employees covered by the compensation act, if he was an employee there may be no recovery on the theory that he was an invitee of the employer.⁹⁹

Where a state compensation act is not applicable because the employee was employed in interstate commerce, his representative must look to the common law or to an appropriate statute for relief,¹ and may properly maintain an action for death.² Likewise, a statute which is applicable only to maritime workers does not preclude an action for the death of one whose employment had no connection with an undertaking to carry on trade, commerce or transportation on public waters.³ A compensation act which specifically excepts from its operation persons whose employment is casual in character, and not in the regular course of business of the employer, does not preclude an action for the death of a person within the exception.⁴

§ 965. Action by, or for Benefit of, Person Not Entitled to Compensation

Although there is authority to the contrary, generally, an action for damages may not be maintained for the death of an employee where the compensation act provides the exclusive remedy, even though there are no persons entitled to the benefits provided for dependents by the act.

Pa.—Vescio v. Pennsylvania Elec. Co., 9 A.2d 546, 336 Pa. 502.

Where the compensation statute provides that its remedies shall exclude other remedies except such rights and remedies as are not provided for by the compensation statute, and the parents of a deceased minor child who are not his dependents have no right to the death benefit provided for by the compensation statute, they may sue under the wrongful death statute.⁵ Many acts, however, substitute a complete new system for the former remedy by action for damages for the death of an employee⁶ and prevent the bringing of an action for the benefit of certain next of kin of a deceased employee, who were prior to the act entitled to the benefit of such action, even though they are not entitled to compensation under the act;⁷ a similar rule has been recognized as to next of kin not entitled to compensation where the deceased employee and the employer had elected to come under the act.⁸ Even though there are no dependents entitled to the benefits provided by the compensation act in lieu of damages for the death of the employee, an action for death may be excluded.⁹

§ 966. Employer's Nonacceptance of, or Noncompliance with, Act

An employer who is subject to the act but does not accept it may be liable in an action for the death of an employee.

Under some acts, if an employer subject to the act does not accept the act, he may be liable in an action for the death of an employee resulting from wrongful act or negligence,¹⁰ and, as discussed infra § 969, the act sometimes permits the legal representative of the deceased employee to elect either to take compensation or to maintain an action for damages if the employer fails to secure the payment of compensation.

Death occurring in place subject to jurisdiction of United States. A provision of the workmen's compensation act authorizing an action for damages and rendering unavailable therein the common-law defenses if the employer does not pay premiums into the state industrial fund does not authorize such an action for the death of an employee where the death occurred at a place which, although within the state, has been subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States since a time prior to the enactment of the workmen's compensation act, where the right of action on the default of the employer is conferred as a part of the scheme of state insurance and not otherwise, and the compensation act abolishes actions at law for negligence of the employer and substitutes another system therefor.¹¹

Government control of employer's business may not be a bar to an action for the death of an employee which is maintainable because the employer was not a subscriber to the state compensation fund.¹²

§ 967. Death from Cause or Occurrence Not within Act or Specifically Excepted

An action may be maintained for the death of an employee which resulted from a cause or occurrence not within the compensation act.

A provision rendering the remedy under the act exclusive does not apply where the death of the employee is not compensable because it is not the result of a cause or occurrence to which the act applies,¹³ and in such case an action will lie if the elements of a right of action for death exist.¹⁴ Thus, where the death resulted from an occupational disease,¹⁵ as where it resulted from silicosis,¹⁶ and such death is not compensable under the workmen's compensation act, an action for death may be maintained. So, the right to maintain an action for death resulting from a maritime tort has apparently been recognized in view of the nonapplicability of a state compensation act.¹⁷

(3) Where contract of employment contemplated that employer would furnish one round trip transportation from Louisiana to Mississippi for work on oil well, but bad weath-

Accident outside jurisdiction. Where a compensation statute is not applicable to an accident occurring outside the jurisdiction, its provision excluding actions for damages against employers subject to the act does not apply to an action for death resulting from such an accident.¹⁸

§ 968. Death Resulting from Willful Act or Omission or Gross Negligence

Under some statutes there may be a recovery of damages for the death of an employee resulting from the employer's willful act or gross negligence.

Some acts provide that nothing therein shall prohibit the recovery of exemplary damages for the death of an employee occasioned by homicide from the willful act or omission or gross negligence of the employer¹⁹ and contemplate the prosecution of the action in the first instance in the court having jurisdiction of such an action generally and not before the industrial accident board.²⁰

Deliberate intention to produce death. An employer has been held not to be protected from liability other than payment of compensation under er caused suspension of operation and employees were being transported home until weather cleared, and employee was killed in an accident during course of such trip.

Action for death resulting from lead poisoning was maintainable under Employers' Liability Act on ground of employer's negligent maintenance of defective working conditions as against contention that industrial board would have duty to inquire whether deceased died from injury caused by accident arising out of, and in course of, employment, or whether death was caused by disease resulting from negligence.

Effect of agreement

Where District of Columbia airline company and pilot domiciled in Tennessee and temporarily residing in New York and making flights from New York City, with stop in Pennsylvania to Birmingham, Alabama, agreed that rights of parties should be governed by Pennsylvania Workmen's Compensation Act, but act provided that it should not apply to accidents outside state except those occurring to Pennsylvania employees engaged in business of state and except accidents to Pennsylvania employees whose duties required them to go temporarily beyond state limits for not more than ninety days, such act did not cover fatal accident to pilot in Alabama and was no bar to an action for wrongful death.

Compensatory damages not recoverable

(1) Where employer's insurer had satisfied judgment under Texas Workmen's Compensation Act, no recovery could be had against insurer for damages under Texas constitution for death allegedly resulting from aggravation by medical treatment of injury.

U.S.—Bonner v. Texas Co., C.C.A. Tex., 89 F.2d 291.

What constitutes "gross negligence"

(1) Under Texas law, "gross negligence," which will authorize recovery of exemplary damages for death of another, is that entire want of care which would raise belief that act or omission complained of was result of a conscious indifference to rights or welfare of person or persons to be affected by it.

U.S.—McAlester v. Sinclair Refining Co., C.C.A.Tex., 146 F.2d 36.

(2) Employer's failure to use an explosion-proof switch in pump-house where gasoline vapors were present did not show such gross negligence as would authorize recovery of punitive damages above compensation paid for death of employee, in view of evidence that switch used was standard equipment in good repair and that points were immersed in oil to prevent sparks.

U.S.—McAlester v. Sinclair Refining Co., supra.

Rights of employer

Where, at time of workman's death, compensation policy had been filed and approved, and insurer and employer had notified Texas industrial accident board that employer had become a subscriber, but workman had not given notice of reservation of common-law rights, employer was entitled to all rights and defenses of a subscriber under Texas law, in common-law action in federal court for workman's death.

workmen's compensation act where death of an employee results from deliberate intention of employer to produce injury or death.²¹

§ 969. Option, Election, Waiver, or Estoppel

An election between the remedy provided by the compensation act for recovery of compensation and a remedy by action against the employer may be permitted or required; and the election of one remedy may preclude the use of the other.

Under some statutes benefits may be received and an action may be brought against a delinquent employer.²² The widow of an employee who sues the employer under both the Federal Employers' Liability Act and under a state compensation act which provides for recovery of compensation by court proceedings is not required to elect between the remedies provided by the two acts.²³

Some acts give the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee an option either to proceed under the act for compensation or to bring an action for damages for wrongful death,²⁴ or permit an election in this respect when²⁵ and only when²⁶ the employer has failed to comply with the act as to securing the payment of compensation. A mere failure to pay compensation which is due does not estop the employer and his insurer to contend in an action for the death of the employee that the sole remedy against the employer is under the compensation law.²⁷

Where under the terms of the act the filing by dependents with the employer of any claim constitutes a release of all claims or demands at law, filing a claim with the industrial accident board and service on the employer prevent an action by the administrator,²⁸ and, even in the absence of express provision, the legal representative of a deceased employee may by proceeding to obtain an award under the workmen's compensation act and accepting a decision in his favor in such proceeding be estopped to maintain an action for damages against the employer.²⁹

Where the act provides that a legal representative who makes application for an award or accepts compensation waives his right to exercise his option to institute proceedings in any court for damages, a legal representative who seeks compensation under the act is estopped to bring an action for damages if the industrial commission finds in favor of the legal representative,³⁰ or such representative accepts compensation under the act;³¹ but the rule is otherwise if the commission rejects the claim on the sole ground that at the time of the injury deceased was not in the employ of defendant employer or killed in the course of employment.³² Where, however, an appeal from the denial of compensation by the commission for want of jurisdiction is pending, the personal representative may not maintain an action for damages.³³

A provision which gives an injured employee the option to claim compensation or to maintain an action at law for damages under certain circumstances where the injury was caused by the employer's gross negligence or willful misconduct does not give such option to one seeking recovery for the death of an employee which, it is alleged, was caused by the gross negligence of the employer.³⁴ The mere filing of a claim under a compensation act has been held not to prevent a widow of a deceased employee from dismissing her claim or refusing the benefits awarded in order that a remedy by suit under another statute may be pursued.³⁵ It has been held that where a personal representative, acted in making his election to accept compensation on misin-formation given by an agent of the employer, he may be permitted to rescind his election and substitute an action at law for the compensation proceedings.³⁶

Under some acts, the parent of a minor employee, who elects to pursue a remedy under the workmen's compensation act, may thereby lose the right to recover damages for the death of such employee,³⁷ and where, as discussed supra § 125, under the act a conclusive presumption has arisen that a minor employee has accepted the provisions of the act and the remedy given by the act is exclusive, the administrator of such employee cannot, after the death of the employee, exercise an election to renounce the benefits of the act and bring an action at law to recover damages.³⁸

Waiver or exercise of option by particular persons, and whose rights affected. Where the statute provides that in case of the death of the employee failure of the employer to secure compensation shall permit the "legal representative" of the employee to elect to claim compensation or to maintain an action for damages, the dependent, and not the administrator or executor, is entitled to elect.³⁹ The view has been taken that a waiver provided for by statute by electing to take compensation or to bring an action for damages for death of an employee is not binding on a beneficiary who is not sui juris,⁴⁰ as, for example, a minor,⁴¹ and the mother of the minor may not, by accepting compensation under the act, waive the right of the minor to the benefit of an action for death caused by wrongful act or neglect where under the constitution such action may not be abrogated and the amount of recovery may not be made subject to any statutory limitation.⁴²

The right of dependent father of a deceased employee to sue where the employer has failed to comply with the provisions of the act has been recognized notwithstanding certain language recognizing liability to the personal representative.⁴³ The view has been expressed that the personal representative of a deceased employee appointed in one state who was not entitled to compensation under the workmen's compensation act of another state could not disaffirm the contract of deceased to be bound by such act and take other proceedings for recovery where other persons were the beneficiaries in respect of compensation under such act.⁴⁴ The acceptance of workmen's compensation by the employee during his lifetime may constitute an acceptance of the act so as to prevent an action by his personal representative for his death which resulted from the injury for which compensation was paid.⁴⁵

Time for exercising option. Where a provision of the act giving persons entitled to compensation for the death of an employee the option to elect to claim compensation or to recover damages if the employer fails to comply with certain provisions requires that the option to elect to bring an action for damages shall be exercised by notice to the employer within a specified time after the injury, failure to give such notice within the specified time prevents the maintenance of the action.⁴⁶

In Arizona, where a constitutional provision requiring the enactment of a workmen's compensation act gives the employee the option to settle for compensation or to retain the right to sue for damages, an act passed pursuant to such constitutional provision does not preclude the personal representative of a deceased employee from bringing an action for damages under the general death statute, even though the case is one in which an employee might elect to take compensation under the act;⁴⁷ but where the act provides that the employee shall be conclusively presumed to have elected to take compensation under the act if he has not given the required notice in writing, the personal representative of a deceased employee may not maintain an action at law for damages under the employers' liability act where such conclusive presumption has arisen,⁴⁸ since the rights of the dependents of such deceased employee who has not given the required

§ 970. Necessity for Tort Chargeable to Employer

Generally, an employer is not liable in an action for the death of an employee, unless the employer has been negligent or otherwise guilty of an actionable tort.

The necessity for a showing that defendant employer was guilty of an actionable tort in order to render him liable in an action for damages for the death of an employee, if the act was otherwise maintainable because of the employer's having elected not to be bound by the compensation act, has been recognized,⁵⁰ and, if in such case defendant employer was not negligent and the accident which caused the death of the employee was due solely to an act of the employee, there can be no recovery.⁵¹ Where, as discussed supra § 968, compensation act permits the maintenance of an action for exemplary damages for the death of an employee, caused by the gross negligence of the employer, the negligence contemplated by the act must be shown.⁵² Under a provision of the compensation act that employers who fail to pay premiums as required by the act shall not be entitled to the benefit of the act during the period of such noncompliance but shall be liable to the personal representatives of employees where death results from the injuries, it has been held that an employer who is in default may be liable, even though in the absence of such provision there would be no liability.⁵³

§ 971. Contributory Negligence

Under particular statutory provisions, an employer sued for damages for the death of an employee may, or may not, be permitted to assert the employee's contributory negligence as a defense.

Under some acts defendant employer may not rely on the contributory negligence of the deceased employee to defeat recovery in an action which is maintainable because of the nonacceptance of,⁵⁴ or the noncompliance with,⁵⁵ the act by the employer. Where the action is for exemplary damages for death resulting from gross negligence of the employer, the defense of contributory negligence is available.⁵⁶

Under other acts, however, the nonaccepting employer may, it seems, rely on the defense of contributory negligence,⁵⁷ and, in an action based on the gross negligence of defendant, the view has been taken that the contributory negligence of the deceased employee constitutes a defense.⁵⁸

§ 972. Assumption of Risk

Under some statutory provisions an employer may not rely on assumption of risk by an employee to defeat an action for the death of the employee; under other provisions the defense is available.

Under some acts defendant employer may not rely on assumption of risk by the deceased employee to defeat recovery in an action which is maintainable because of the nonacceptance of the act by the employer,⁵⁹ or his default in making payments, to the compensation fund;⁶⁰ but the defense is available in an action for exemplary damages based on the gross negligence of the employer.⁶¹ Under some acts, however, in the event that the personal representative has exercised his election to bring an action, his right to recover may be defeated by the fact that the deceased employee assumed the risk.⁶² In a jurisdiction in which the distinction is recognized between voluntary and contractual assumption of risk, the view has been taken that a provision eliminating assumption of risk as a ground for defeating recovery refers to voluntary, and not contractual, assumption of risk.⁶³

Under the various statutory provisions an employer may or may not rely on the negligence of a fellow servant to defeat recovery in an action for the death of an employee.

Under some acts where an action lies for the death of an employee, defendant employer may not rely on the negligence of a fellow servant of the deceased employee to defeat recovery,⁶⁴ as, for example, where the action is maintainable because of the nonacceptance of,⁶⁵ or noncompliance with,⁶⁶ the act by the employer. The defense may be available, however, in an action for exemplary damages based on gross negligence of the employer.⁶⁷

§ 974. Effect of Award, Judgment, or Finding in Compensation Proceeding

An award, judgment, or finding, in a compensation proceeding or the acceptance of compensation thereunder may or may not affect an action against the employer for the death of the employee.

A judgment in a proceeding for compensation for the death of an employee denying compensation on the ground that the death did not result from a cause which was within the operation of the act is not a bar to a subsequent action for such death,⁶⁸ and, in an action by the widow of a deceased employee for his death under a provision of the act permitting such action where the employer has failed to insure, the finding of the industrial commission in a prior compensation proceeding that the evidence was insufficient to establish that the deceased employee received an injury arising out of, and in the course of, any employment with the alleged employer or that the death was caused by injury does not constitute a defense.⁶⁹

So, a determination in a compensation proceeding by the compensation board or commission denying an award on the ground that the accident or injury did not arise in the course of employment is not a bar to a subsequent action for the death of the employee⁷⁰ or of an alleged employee⁷¹ against the employer or the alleged employer. Where, however, the disallowance of a claim for compensation involves a determination that the death was not a result of negligence by the employer, a subsequent action for death which is dependent on negligence of the employer may not be maintained.⁷²

Where a widow claimed compensation under the Longshoremen's Act, but moved to dismiss her claim, the judgment of the commissioner after denial of the motion that the claim was compensable and the award of compensation which the widow refused to accept does not preclude the maintenance of an action for damages by the employee's personal representative.⁷³ A decision of the workmen's compensation board making an award against the employer and in favor of a state fund holding that the employee left no dependents, that no claim was made for his funeral expenses, and that his death arose out of, and in the course of, his employment, does not bar an action by the employee's personal representative against the employer for the death of the employee,⁷⁴ and does not prevent the litigation in such an action of an issue whether the death arose out of, and in the course of, the employment.⁷⁵

modified judgment by the court of a state in a compensation proceeding, awarding compensation for the death of an employee on a determination that the deceased employee was engaged in intrastate commerce and, therefore, subject to the compensation act of such state, is conclusive in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act for such death where the judgment in the compensation proceeding is rendered first and there is, in legal contemplation, an identity of parties,⁷⁷ whether or not the determination as to the character of the commerce is correct,⁷⁸ and prevents the maintenance of the action under such liability act.⁷⁹

A similar rule as to conclusiveness has been recognized where the determination as to employment in intrastate commerce, and the award of compensation, were made by the industrial accident board and a judgment of court on such award was entered, in so far as the rights of the widow of the deceased employee are affected, where she prosecuted the compensation proceeding and also, as personal representative of the deceased employee, prosecuted the action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act for her own benefit and that of another.⁸⁰ It has been held, however, that, where the employee was engaged in interstate commerce, an award to the widow under the state compensation act is void and does not bar an action by the personal representative under the federal statute;⁸¹ and the view has been expressed that the award in the compensation proceeding is not a bar to the whole cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act where there are persons claiming as beneficiaries in such action who were not entitled to share in the award of compensation.⁸²

a state compensation act, sought and accepted by a dependent of a deceased employee with full knowledge of his rights, has been held to bar the subsequent prosecution of a death claim in an admiralty court by the dependent as personal representative, for the benefit of the dependent.⁸³

Payment of award or compensation. Under some workmen's compensation acts, no action may be brought against the employer for the death of the employee where the employer has paid a compensation award⁸⁴ for the death of the employee.⁸⁵ Where the statute governing actions for death gives a right of action only when the person injured could have maintained an action for injuries if he had survived, as considered supra § 1533, no action may be maintained under the statute if the employee accepted compensation under the compensation act,⁸⁶ or if payments of compensation for the death of the employee have been accepted.⁸⁷

Under a constitutional provision that the right to recover damages for death shall never be abrogated except in cases where compensation is provided for by law, the payment of part of the burial expenses and a specified amount to the state treasury as required by the compensation act when there are no dependents is compensation.⁸⁸ Where an action for exemplary damages for death of an employee resulting from the employer's gross negligence, as considered supra § 968, is permissible, the fact that the employer has paid compensation so that actual damages may not be recovered in the action for exemplary damages does not prevent the maintenance of the suit.⁸⁹ must be timely brought. Where the death is covered by a workmen's compensation act, such an action may be dismissed.

An action for death of an employee must be brought within the time specified by statute.⁹⁰

Dismissal of a suit against an employer or insurer for the death of an employee whose death is covered by the provisions of the workmen's compensation act is proper.⁹¹

§ 976. — Pleading

- a. Declaration, petition, or complaint
- b. Plea or answer
- c. Issues, proof, and variance

a. Declaration, Petition, or Complaint

General rules as to the declaration, petition, or complaint apply in actions for the wrongful death of an employee, but it is sometimes required that the nonapplicability of the compensation act be pleaded.

General rules as to the declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for wrongful death, as considered in Death §§ 67-74, apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.⁹² The necessity for alleging the negligence of defendant employer⁹³ as the proximate cause of the death⁹⁴ in an action maintainable because of defendant employer's election not to come under the act has been recognized.

While, as shown infra subdivision b of this section, the view has been taken that, under certain circumstances at least, the existence of a compensation act and the election of the deceased employee before his death to accept compensation are to be pleaded as matters of defense, usually, where the remedy provided by the workmen's compensation act is exclusive if the act applies, plaintiff, in order to state a cause of action for the death of an employee, must allege facts which show that the act does not apply if the act is otherwise applicable to the other facts alleged,⁹⁵ that is, he must negative the presumption that the act applies.⁹⁶ So, where the act makes the remedy thereunder exclusive except that the legal representative of a deceased employee may elect either to claim compensation or to maintain an action for damages if the employer fails to secure the payment of compensation, plaintiff must allege such failure where the other facts alleged show that the act is applicable.⁹⁷

Where the foregoing rules are applicable, a complaint which does not comply with them is demur-

table⁹⁸ as not stating a cause of action.⁹⁹ There is, however, authority for the view that a complaint by an administrator is not demurrable where it does not appear on the face of the complaint that the act applies to defendant employer.¹ The view has been expressed that the contention that an action by the personal representative of a deceased employee is barred by his election to take compensation under the act is a matter of defense which is not presented by a demurrer to the complaint for failure to state a cause of action.² Where it does not appear from the pleadings or issues made that the employer and employee are covered by the act,³ and a fortiori, where it is shown by the pleadings that the employer is presumptively a person not included in the employers covered by the act,⁴ no presumption that the act applies arises, and plaintiff is not required affirmatively to plead wherein the act is not applicable.⁵

Where the employer may be liable in an action for the death of the employee resulting from employer's negligence if employer failed to comply with the compensation act, or resulting from employer's deliberate intention to produce death, a complaint seeking recovery on either theory is sufficient if it alleges all the essentials of one of the theories.⁶ Where by an election not to be bound by the act defendant employer is precluded from relying on the contributory negligence of, or the assumption of risk by, the deceased employee, as considered supra

§§ 971, 972, it is not necessary that the complaint should contain an averment as to whether the employee had knowledge of the unsafe condition of the place of work.⁷

Under statutory provisions authorizing recovery of exemplary damages for the death of an employee caused by the willful act or gross negligence of the employer, plaintiff must plead actual loss or injury.⁸

Death of minor employee. Where the compensation act makes the remedy exclusive in cases to which the act applies, the parent of a minor employee, in order to state a cause of action for the death of such employee, must allege facts which show that the act does not apply if the act is otherwise applicable to the facts alleged,⁹ that is, there must be allegations negating a presumption, arising from the facts alleged, that the act applies,¹⁰ and the complaint is demurrable as not stating a cause of action where the facts alleged show that the case is one within the provisions of the act.¹¹ Where, under the statute giving a right of action for wrongful death, no cause of action is vested in the mother of a minor child, if she is married, except on a showing that her husband has abandoned his family, such fact of abandonment must be alleged in an action by the mother of a minor employee for such employee's death in order to state a cause of action.¹²

Amendment setting up death statute of another state. On a motion to amend a complaint in an action by the personal representative of a deceased employee so as to set up the death statute of another state where the death occurred, the court has declined to consider defendant's objection to the amendment based on the existence of a compensation act in such other state, on the ground that the existence of such statute was a matter of defense.¹³

General rules as to pleas or answers apply in actions for death of an employee. Matters of affirmative defense with respect to the application of the compensation act must be pleaded.

Subject to applicable qualifications and limitations, general rules as to pleas and answers, as considered in Death § 76, in actions for wrongful death apply in actions for the death of a deceased employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.¹⁴ It has been held that the theory that the remedy of a plaintiff suing for the death of an employee is exclusively under the workmen's compensation act is an affirmative defense to be pleaded by the employer.¹⁵ Where the declaration presents two theories of liability, a plea which meets only one of them is not a complete defense.¹⁶ Where the employer may be liable notwithstanding the compensation act if the employee had no knowledge that employer had complied with the act and the declaration alleges a failure to post required notices of compliance, actual knowledge of the employee must be pleaded by way of defense.¹⁷ An election by an employee before his death to accept compensation is a matter of defense to be raised by plea or answer in an action by his representative under a death act, where the employee has a right of election which is personal to him.¹⁸ In an action by the personal representative of a deceased employee under the death statute of another state where the death occurred, the view has been taken that the existence of a compensation act of such other state is to be pleaded as a matter of defense.¹⁹ Some acts have required that, in order that an allegation that defendant employer has rejected the act may be made an issue, it is necessary to enter a verified plea denying such allegation.²⁰ Where a statute authorizes an action for exemplary damages for the death of an employee resulting from the intentional act or gross negligence of the employer, but provides that no award, ruling, or finding of the industrial accident board shall be pleaded, the employer may, out of the hearing of the jury, plead a recovery under the compensation act to show that he is not liable to pay the amount of damages for the actual injury.²¹

In an action for the death of an employee brought against the employer in spite of the existence of a workmen's compensation act, general rules as to issues, proof, and variance apply.

Subject to qualifications and limitations, general rules as to issues, proof, and variance in an action for wrongful death, as considered in Death § 79, apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.²² Where the facts alleged indicate that deceased and defendant were master and servant engaged in operations of the class covered by the compensation act, and the jurisdiction of the court is challenged on the ground that the remedy is under the compensation act, evidence that the employer is not excepted from the act is competent.²³

Where there is a presumption that the employer and the deceased employee were both within the compensation act, and the right to maintain an action for damages depended on an agreement or election not to come within the act, there can be no recovery in the absence of proof of such election.²⁴ So, the necessity for proof of the employer's negligence in an action maintainable because of his election not to be bound by the act has been recognized.²⁵

§ 977. — Evidence

- a. Presumptions
- b. Burden of proof
- c. Admissibility
- d. Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions

Except as qualified and limited by the effect of the workmen's compensation acts, general rules as to presumptions in actions for wrongful death apply in actions for the death of an employee prosecuted against an employer notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.

Subject to certain qualifications and limitations, general rules as to presumptions in an action for wrongful death, as discussed in Death § 80, apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.²⁶ It has been held that in every case where the personal representative of an employee sues the employer for the death of the employee, a presumption arises that the workmen's compensation statute is applicable,²⁷ and that the presumption prevails until the contrary is shown,²⁸ as by proof that the employer has not complied with the statute,²⁹ or that the employee is prohibited by law from engaging in the employment.³⁰ Likewise, a specific statutory presumption that employers and employees not excepted by the terms of the act have accepted the act applies in an action for the death of an employee³¹ where it appears that the employer gave no notice that he would not be bound by the act,³² and nothing to contradict the presumption has been shown.³³

Where the employer failed to insure, a presumption may arise under the express terms of some acts that the injury was the direct result and grew out of the employer's negligence;³⁴ the presumption is not conclusive,³⁵ and disappears when contradicted or controverted by the evidence of plaintiff dependent in an action for the death of an employee if the circumstances are such as to afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence and the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption.³⁶ This rule does not, however, apply where the presumption is contradicted by evidence of the party against whom it is invoked.³⁷

Except as affected by the existence of workmen's compensation acts, general rules with respect to the burden of proof in actions for death apply in actions for the death of an employee brought against an employer notwithstanding the acts.

General rules with respect to the burden of proof in actions for death generally, as considered in Death § 80, apply, with some qualifications, in actions for the death of an employee brought against an employer despite the existence of a compensation law.³⁸ According to some authorities, plaintiff has the burden of proving that the workmen's compensation act is not applicable,³⁹ at least where it is alleged that defendant has accepted the act or is subject to its provisions.⁴⁰ Where the action for damages is prosecuted on the theory that defendant employer has elected not to come within the act, according to some cases plaintiff has the burden of proving such election in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary;⁴¹ but it has been held under some acts that defendant employer has the burden of producing evidence that he has accepted the act in order to avoid the application of the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act modifying common-law liability of an employer who does not accept provisions for compensation.⁴²

Matters relating to the applicability of the compensation act which are affirmative defenses, as considered supra § 976 b, must be proved by defendant.⁴³ Where the presumption has arisen that an employer failing to insure was guilty of negligence proximately causing the fatal injury, the burden is on the employer to rebut the presumption by negating every fact which would justify a finding of negligence.⁴⁴

Where an employer who has not accepted provisions for compensation may rely on the contributory negligence of the deceased employee to defeat recovery, defendant has the burden of showing contributory negligence.⁴⁵ Where defendant employer seeks to avoid liability on the theory that the deceased employee was guilty of willful negligence, plaintiff does not have the burden of showing that deceased was free from willful negligence.⁴⁶ So, also, even though the employee's failure to notify the employer or the employer's representative of a defect or negligence of which the employee had knowledge, within a reasonable time, may defeat a recovery against an employer who has not accepted the compensation act, plaintiff is not required to prove absence of such knowledge⁴⁷ or the giving of such notice.⁴⁸

Under some acts where plaintiff has exercised an election to proceed at common law for the death of an employee, he cannot recover unless he shows that the deceased employee neither knew, nor was at fault for not knowing, of the dangers involved in the operation in connection with which death resulted.⁴⁹ In a suit for exemplary damages for the death of an employee from the willful act or gross negligence of the employer, plaintiff must prove actual loss or injury,⁵⁰ and the employer's willfulness or gross neglect.⁵¹

Subject to some qualifications, general rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply.

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence in an action for wrongful death apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.⁵² Under a specific statutory provision that in a suit to recover exemplary damages for the death of an employee resulting from a willful act or gross negligence, an award, ruling, or finding of the industrial accident board in proceedings for compensation shall not be offered in evidence, the fact of recovery may not be offered to establish actual loss or injury,⁵³ but the records showing such recovery may be offered by the employer out of the presence of the jury,⁵⁴ and they may be admitted in evidence to show that defendant should not be compelled to pay damages for the actual injury in addition to the exemplary damages which may be recovered in the suit.⁵⁵

d. Weight and Sufficiency

General rules with respect to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in actions for death apply.

General rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in an action for wrongful death, as considered in Death §§ 86, 87, apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding

ing the existence of a compensation act.⁵⁶ A preponderance of the evidence is necessary to rebut a presumption that the death of the employee was proximately caused by the negligence of an employer who failed to insure.⁵⁷ A provision of the compensation act that the identification of the signature of the employee on the register of the employer shall constitute conclusive proof of his election to operate under the act does not render the testimony of a subscribing witness that the deceased employee signed the compensation register conclusive of such signing in an action for the death of such employee prosecuted on the theory that he had not accepted the provisions of the compensation act.⁵⁸

§ 978. — Trial, Judgment, and Review

General rules with respect to trial, judgment, and review apply in actions for the death of an employee brought against the employer notwithstanding the existence of a workmen's compensation act.

General rules with respect to trial, judgment, and review, particularly those considered in Death §§ 88-94, apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.⁵⁹ Where the complaint alleges an intentional injury, and such injuries are not compensable under the compensation act, defendant is not entitled to summary judgment on the ground that the exclusive remedy is that provided by the compensation act.⁶⁰

Questions of law and fact; taking case from jury. Questions of fact, where on conflicting evidence there could reasonably be a finding for either party, are for the jury;⁶¹ but a question need not be submitted to the jury where the evidence is insufficient to present an issue of fact,⁶² and when the evidence admits of only one conclusion an issue is one of law to be decided by the court.⁶³ Where defendant employer who has not accepted provisions for compensation has the burden of proving the contributory negligence of the deceased employee if he may rely on such negligence to defeat recovery, defendant is not entitled to a directed verdict unless the proof is conclusive that the accident would not have happened except through the employee's negligence.⁶⁴ be relied on by defendant employer to defeat recovery, but it is necessary to show the negligence of defendant, an instruction that it is no defense that deceased came to his death by any negligence on his part is improper because of the omission before "negligence" of the qualifying word "contributory."⁶⁵ Where the contributory negligence of, or the voluntary assumption of risk by, the deceased employee may not be relied on to defeat recovery, an instruction requested by defendant employer, based on the theory that contributory negligence or assumption of risk may so be relied on, is properly refused.⁶⁶ Instructions as to other matters must conform to general rules.⁶⁷

Appeal and error. General rules as to review apply in an action for the death of an employee prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a compensation act.⁶⁸

2. OTHER ACTIONS

§ 979. Action by Parent for Injury to Child

An action by the parent of a child against the employer of the child for loss to the parent resulting from injury to the child may, or may not, be precluded by the provisions of particular compensation acts.

According to some cases, in the absence of a direct enactment in the statute or a necessary implication from its terms, a compensation act will not deprive the parent of a minor employee of his independent right of action for loss from an injury to the minor,⁶⁹ which includes damages for the loss of services of the minor⁷⁰ and for expenses incurred by reason of the injury.⁷¹ There is, however, authority for the view that where the compensation act provides a complete and exclusive remedy for all injured employees and those who may claim as beneficiaries, a parent may not recover in a common-law action,⁷² or under another statutory provision expressly permitting a parent to recover for loss of services of a minor child,⁷³ where the act is otherwise applicable; and in such case under some statutes a parent, in order to save his common-law right of action, must elect,⁷⁴

68. Harmless or prejudicial error

(1) In action for death of employee because of whose failure to sign workmen's compensation register, claim for compensation under compensation act had been dismissed, references by plaintiff's counsel to workmen's compensation on examination of jurors were not prejudicial to defendant although improper.

Ind.—General Printing Corporation v. Umback, 195 N.E. 281, 100 Ind.App. 285.

(2) Fact that death of coal mine employee was caused by his own negligence and would bar recovery in administratrix' death action at law against employer was a "matter of defense" on merits and was not before reviewing court on appeal involving question whether denial of compensation award by industrial commission was res judicata of action.

Va.—Griffith v. Raven Red Ash Coal Co., 20 S.E.2d 530, 179 Va. 790.

(3) Where trial of wrongful death action by administrator of deceased employee against employer was conducted by both parties without regard for workmen's compensation law or application of its provisions, and proceeded as a common-law action with exception of unsupported allegation in declaration that employer had not complied with statute and was not entitled to its protection, question of applicability thereof, not being jurisdictional in character, would not be considered or reviewed on writ of error.

or arrange to have the minor child elect,⁷⁵ not to be bound by the act, and, if the parent fails to make or to cause such election, he accepts the provisions of the act and thereby surrenders his rights to any other method and form of compensation.⁷⁶

Where the remedy under the compensation act is exclusive, a parent may not maintain an action for the use and benefit of a minor employee, under another statutory provision, for an injury within the act.⁷⁷ Some acts measure the limit of liability of an employer as to the amount which is reasonable and necessary for the proper maintenance, support, and care of an injured employee and abrogate any other right which a parent of an adult employee may have to recover from the employer additional amounts paid by him for medical, hospital, and nursing care of such child.⁷⁸ Even in jurisdictions in which the right of a parent to recover is recognized the parent of a minor employee cannot, in a common-law action, recover for loss resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant.⁷⁹

Illegal employment. Under some statutes, a parent may not sue for injuries to his child who is otherwise subject to the workmen's compensation act, even though the employment was illegal;⁸⁰ but under other statutes, the parent may sue if the child was illegally employed, even though the child is permitted to recover compensation.⁸¹ Where the compensation act preserves the right of action for damages by an illegally employed minor only if the minor is under a specified age, the parent of a minor older than the specified age and otherwise within the compensation act may not sue at law for loss of services or expenses.⁸² The parent of a minor employee may not maintain an action against the employer for loss of services on the theory that because the minor was unlawfully permitted to work where liquor was sold no employer-employee relationship existed.⁸³

§ 980. Action by Spouse of Injured Employee

It is generally held that the spouse of an injured employee may not maintain action against the employer for loss or damage incident to an injury for which the employer must pay compensation. Certain other rights of action of the spouse, however, are not barred.

Some workmen's compensation acts, in the absence of an effective election not to be bound by the act or of a default by the employer rendering the act inapplicable, take away a husband's common-law right of action for loss of consortium⁸⁴ or for loss of services.⁸⁵ Likewise, many compensation

Reason for rule

Provision eliminating defense that injury to employee did not result from negligence or other fault of employer is limited to cases where damages are result of direct injury to person of plaintiff, and does not include those which were sustained by plaintiff in consequence of direct injury to person of another.

Effect of agreement

Parents of illegally employed minor could not maintain an action in trespass for injury sustained by minor in course of his employment where minor entered into compensation agreements with employer with consent and approval of minor's parents and their counsel, and of workmen's compensation board, and where all moneys had been paid pursuant to terms of agreements.

Where compensation received by guardian

Where minor employee's guardian received compensation from employer for minor's injury, employer was relieved of all liability, even though minor was working in violation of law and employer did not have ten or more employees; hence, employer was not liable to minor's parents for loss of minor's services.

acts preclude an action by the wife of an employee from recovering damages for loss of consortium or services from injury or disease compensable under the act.⁸⁶

The right of a wife to recover for fright and mental shock resulting from the condition of her husband has been recognized notwithstanding the employer of the husband is a subscriber to the compensation insurance fund where the employer has not complied with his obligation under his contract with the insurance association to act in caring for an injured employee.⁸⁷ A wife who seeks to recover damages from the employer of her husband for the husband's alleged addiction to liquor unlawfully furnished to him by the employer, under the provision of a federal statute which purports to give to certain classes of persons a right of action when they have been injured by addiction to the liquor habit of one from whom they have the right of support, through unlawful acts of others, need not seek compensation under the workmen's compensation law but may bring an action in a court in which common-law procedure prevails.⁸⁸ Since the right of a deceased employee's widow to recover damages for mutilation of employee's body from employer's insurer cannot be enforced under the compensation act, a suit for such damages is not precluded by the compensation act.⁸⁹

Where a husband of an employee may maintain an action against an employer who failed to comply with the compensation act for damages for injury to the wife⁹⁰ or for loss of services when the employer has failed to comply with the act,⁹¹ the employer may be deprived of certain defenses.⁹²

Pleading. A common-law declaration by a husband for damages for loss of consortium, growing out of personal injuries sustained by plaintiff's infant wife by reason of the alleged negligence of defendant as employer of the wife, has been held to be demurrable where such declaration shows that defendant was an employer within the meaning of the workmen's compensation law, in the absence of an allegation either that defendant had elected not to come within the act or that defendant is deprived of the benefit of the act by reason of some default on his part.⁹³

§ 981. Action by Child of Employee

Actions for injuries independent of the injury to an employee which is compensable under the compensation act may be maintained against an employer by the child of an employee.

A minor child who seeks to recover damages from the employer of his father for the father's alleged addiction to liquor unlawfully furnished to him by the employer, under the provision of a federal statute which purports to give to certain classes of persons a right of action when they have been injured by addiction to the liquor habit of one from whom they have the right of support, through unlawful acts of others, need not seek compensation under the workmen's compensation law but may bring an action in a court in which common-law procedure prevails.⁹⁴ Since the workmen's compensation act provides no remedy for the mutilation or failure properly to preserve the dead body of an employee, the children of a deceased employee may maintain an action against an employer for such mutilation or failure to preserve.⁹⁵

§ 982. Miscellaneous Actions

- a. In general
- b. To secure contribution
- c. To secure indemnity
- d. Right of third person compromising action by employee or his representative
- e. Right of third person paying compensation

a. In General

Generally, the provisions of a workmen's compensation act which make the remedies under the act exclusive apply to third persons suing in the employee's right, but not to those suing in their own right. Rights to death benefits other than those provided by the compensation act may or may not be affected.

Provisions of workmen's compensation acts which make the payment of compensation the exclusive remedy, except for other remedies expressly provided, may apply to any person suing in the employee's right;⁹⁶ but not to a person suing in his own right,⁹⁷ at least where the right arises from the breach of an independent duty of the employer to the person suing.⁹⁸ The compensation act may also be exclusive with respect to any remedies granted to the personal representative, dependent, or next of kin of the employee at common law or otherwise;⁹⁹ to the rights of action of all persons because of the injury to an employee, when he and the employer come under the act;¹ to any civil liability of a complying employer for injury or death of an employee in his service;² and, in the event of the death of the employee, to all personal liability of a complying employer to beneficiaries named in the act, or to beneficiaries named in the employers' liability law, or to anyone else.³ The provision of the Federal Employers' Liability Act excluding other remedies applies to an employee's legal representative, spouse, or anyone else entitled to recover damages from the United States under any federal tort liability statute.⁴

Even though the liability of an employer for injuries to, or death of, his employees is limited to that provided by the workmen's compensation act, the employer is not protected from suit for injuries to a third person merely because the third person's injuries resulted from the employer's negligence toward his employees.⁵

Rights to death benefits. A person entitled to a death benefit under an employer's private plan providing for such benefits, as discussed in Master and Servant §§ 167-170, may sue to recover such benefit even though, as a matter of precaution, he filed a workmen's compensation claim, which he later withdrew, and which the compensation referee or-

Persons attempting rescue

Fact that dependents of employees, who had been fatally asphyxiated by negligence of employer in requiring use of gasoline pump in confined area of water main, were limited to remedy against employer under workmen's compensation statute, would not derogate from right of members of fire rescue squad, to sue employer for injuries sustained when they became asphyxiated as result of attempt to rescue employees although negligence of employer towards his own employees provided base on which rested cause of action of attempted rescuers against employer. dered dismissed.⁶ The widow of a police officer who has been awarded workmen's compensation for his death is not barred from the right to bring action to compel payment of a pension under the provisions of a city charter providing that a person applying for a pension waives provisions of the compensation act.⁷ Where, under a plan providing for benefits for work relief employees, as considered generally in Social Security and Public Welfare § 12, death benefits are authorized, a widow of an employee who accepted such benefits in her individual capacity may, nevertheless, sue the employing city for the death of the employee in her capacity as personal representative.⁸

b. To Secure Contribution

Although there is some authority to the contrary, a third person sued for damages for injuries to, or death of, an employee is not entitled to contribution from the employer where the remedy under the compensation act is exclusive.

It is generally held that a third person sued for damages for the injury or death of an employee is not entitled to contribution from the employer where the compensation act makes its remedy against the employer exclusive.⁹ In some jurisdictions and under some statutes, however, the right to contribution is recognized.¹⁰ It has been held that a third person could not recover contribution from the employer unless the latter was guilty of gross negligence, even though such a recovery is not barred by the compensation act.¹¹

c. To Secure Indemnity

A third person sued for injuries to, or death of, an employee may or may not be entitled to indemnity from an employer who is liable to pay compensation under the compensation act.

A compensation act which makes the liability prescribed exclusive and in place of all other liability of the employer at common law or otherwise to the employee or any other person has been held to preclude recovery of indemnity from the employer by a third person sued for injuries to an employee.¹² Under many workmen's compensation acts, a third person sued for damages for injury from its operation by another, as considered generally in Motor Vehicles § 442, the third person's right to indemnity from one who is responsible for negligence causing the injury, as considered generally in Indemnity § 21, is not excluded even though the person responsible is the employer of the person injured, so that the exclusive remedy against the employer for the injury would be under the workmen's compensation act.²³

A third person settling an action by the employee may or may not be entitled to recover from the employer under particular compensation acts.

In an action against an employer by a third person who has compromised an action for personal injuries against such person by the employer's employee, on an alleged agreement of the employer to indemnify such person, the person may not recover on the theory that he is subrogated to the rights of the employee against the employer in view of the provision of the compensation act which gives an employer who pays compensation the right of subrogation to the rights of the employee against a negligent third person.²⁴ It has been held that when an employer contributed to the workmen's compensation insurance fund and compensation was paid for the death of an employee, the employer is not liable for contribution to a third person who settled a wrongful death action by the dependents of the employee.²⁵ A third person who settles a suit for damages against him by an employee may have a right to sue the employer for contribution where he was not liable to pay compensation to the employee under the compensation act because the employee was not engaged in the kind of employment covered by the act.²⁶ It has been held that a third person who settled an action against him for injuries to an employee of the United States may be entitled to contribution from the United States.²⁷ Where the personal representative of an employee of a contractor's subcontractor sued the principal who settled the action and sued the contractor for the amount thus expended, the contractor may have a right of action in turn against the subcontractor, even though the subcontractor had paid compensation.²⁸

A third person who is liable to pay and pays compensation to an employee may be entitled to reimbursement from the employer.

Cal.—Baugh v. Rogers, 148 P.2d 633, 24 C.2d 200, 152 A.L.R. 1043.

Lessor's insurer

Statutory liability of lessor of motor truck for injuries sustained by lessee's employee riding in truck driven by fellow employee engaged in lessee's business was based on negligence of driver so that lessee was liable to lessor for its driver's negligence independently of any duty that lessee owed its injured employee, and therefore lessor's insurer, as subrogee to lessor's rights could recover amount paid by insurer in defending employee's action and satisfying judgment, notwithstanding lessee's liability to employee for workmen's compensation.

Statutory estoppel held ineffective against third person

Estoppel provided for by statute providing that insurance carrier shall be estopped to assert as defense to claim for compensation that employee was not engaged in extra-hazardous employment does not run against a third party asserting a derivative right of contribution against an allegedly negligent employer.

Effect of claim for, or payment of, compensation

(1) Mere filing of a claim for compensation because of death of a government employee, followed by an abandonment thereof without claim having been perfected and without payment either of compensation or expense by bureau of employees' compensation, would not constitute an election by heirs of employee constituting a defense to an action for contribution against United States by joint tort-feasor responsible for death and settling claim of heirs.

U.S.—Brown & Root v. U. S., supra.

(2) Where case of occupant of government truck injured in accident due to combined negligence of driver and contractor was considered as compensable by all parties, and at time of settlement with contractor he made no objection to deduction from his portion of amounts paid for or on his behalf, or to credit on future payments of compensation to which he might become entitled, occupant elected to receive compensation from government, and to such extent it would constitute a defense to action by contractor against government for contribution to amounts paid by contractor in settlement of occupant's claim.

liable to pay compensation to an employee of a contractor, the principal paying compensation,²⁹ or his insurer,³⁰ may be entitled to reimbursement from the immediate employer if the latter would have been liable to the employee independently of the statutory provision; but the rule does not apply where the immediate employer is not subject to the compensation act.³¹ It has been held that a contractor who paid compensation to an employee under the compensation act may not sue his principal on the theory that the injured person was the employee of the principal where the act makes the payment of compensation the exclusive remedy against the employer.³²

Dual employment. Where an employee of two employers, both of whom carried compensation insurance, was paid compensation by insurer of one employer, insurer had no right of action against the other employer as subrogee of the employee.³³

A state fund which paid compensation to an employee has been held entitled to recover from the employer who failed to pay compensation where the employer's insurance carrier was insolvent.³⁴

a. Rights and Liabilities Generally

§ 983. In General

Under the workmen's compensation acts, an employee or his personal representative is not in all circumstances precluded from maintaining a common-law action as against third persons causing the injury; but some statutes qualify the right to maintain the action, and designate the manner in which the liability of the third person should be enforced.

Usually the workmen's compensation acts do not prevent an employee³⁵ or the personal representa-

Exclusive or concurrent right as between employer or insurers and employee or dependents to sue and recover see infra § 1003.

Other statements of rule

(1) Labor code does not alter the correlative rights and liabilities of persons who do not occupy the reciprocal statuses of employer and employee, or relieve one not the employer from any liability imposed by statute or common law.

Cal.—Baugh v. Rogers, 148 P.2d 633, 24 C.2d 200, 152 A.L.R. 1043.

(2) Workmen's compensation act does not abrogate, modify, or affect in any way, injured employee's common-law right to exact payment of damages from negligent third party or tort-feasor.

Okl.—Parkhill Truck Co. v. Wilson, 125 P.2d 203, 190 Okl. 473.

(3) Workmen's compensation law substitutes benefits which are not subject to uncertainties of litigation and defenses incident to, and which arise from, master and servant relationship for common-law right of action, but it leaves unaffected the liabilities of third persons.

N.Y.—Employers Mut. Liability Ins. Co. of Wis. v. Refined Syrups Sales Corp., 53 N.Y.S.2d 835, 184 Misc. 941.

(4) Employer's liability under workmen's compensation act to injured employee does not bar employee's recovery of damages from tort-feasor liable for injuries, since employer's liability does not rest in tort, but is predicated on relationship of employer and employee, and compensation payable under act does not constitute satisfaction for all damages sustained by employee.

Mo.—Schumacher v. Leslie, 232 S.W. 2d 913, 360 Mo. 1238.

Benefits of act

A party liable at common law for tortious injury to another's employee is entirely without scope of all benefits of workmen's compensation act.

Fla.—Hartquist v. Tamiami Trail Tours, 190 So. 533, 139 Fla. 328.

Separate duties

The duty of an employer to pay compensation under statute is entirely separate from the duty of a third person to pay damages to a servant for personal injuries caused by third-party tort-feasor.

N.H.—McCullough v. John B. Varick Co., 10 A.2d 245, 90 N.H. 409.

Unrelated action

Action against negligent third party is independent of, and unrelated to, workmen's compensation proceedings.

Statute held not controlling

(1) Where neither employee nor employer had accepted Michigan workmen's compensation act, its provisions were not controlling and would not, of themselves, bar recovery by employee against third-party wrongdoer where employee had accepted compensation under some other act.

U.S.—Alexander v. Creel, D.C.Mich., 54 F.Supp. 652.

(2) Action against insured third-party tort-feasor for injuries sustained by compensated employee was not barred by want of notice under statutory provision that any employee waives any right of action against an insured employer unless at time of hiring he gave his employer written notice that he claimed such right of action, unless plaintiff became an employee of defendant.

Nature of rights

In action against a third-party tort-feasor for death of an employee whose employer is insured under the workmen's compensation act, the rights of the employee's dependents as next of kin under the wrongful death act are not necessarily identical with their rights as dependents under the workmen's compensation act, in that, under the former act, any amount recovered is for pecuniary loss, and after payment of funeral bill is to be distributed as personality to the next of kin as in case of intestacy without regard to dependency, while the award under the compensation act is based on dependency and not on pecuniary loss.

Minn.—Nyquist v. Batchner, 51 N.W.2d 566, 235 Minn. 491.

Joint tort-feasors

Where right of action for wrongful death arises from personal breach of master's common-law duty to servant, whether or not nondelegable, or breach of nondelegable common-law duty by master's vice principal or alter ego, and case is not within workmen's compensation act, deceased servant's personal representative may proceed against master and joint tort-feasors, whose negligence or wrongful acts concurred with master's negligence in producing death, under homicide act.

caused by a third person has been so construed, in the light of another provision recognizing a right of action against a third person, as not to prevent such an action by an injured employee³⁹ or by the dependents of a deceased employee.⁴⁰

Under the construction given some acts which permit the personal representative to bring an action for damages for the death of an employee against the person other than the employer, whose negligence caused the death, notwithstanding the death is also compensable, the cause of action is for the benefit of the heirs or next of kin as defined by the general statute applicable to death actions,⁴¹ and not of dependents as defined by the compensation act.⁴² Some provisions, however, while they

Liberal construction

Provision of workmen's compensation act relating to recovery against third persons whose negligence resulted in injury to employee whose employer is subject to the act is to be liberally construed.

Ill.—Johnson v. Turner, 49 N.E.3d 297, 319 Ill.App. 265.

Strict construction

Provision in workmen's compensation law relating to third-party actions by injured employees should be strictly construed in the light of past history and precedent.

N.Y.—McCue v. J. F. Shea Co., 24 N.Y.S.2d 307, 175 Misc. 557, affirmed 24 N.Y.S.2d 130, 260 App.Div. 946.

Intent

(1) Workmen's compensation act regulating third-party procedure is intended to regulate all third-party claims and not only those specifically mentioned, notwithstanding act refers to actions for "negligence or wrong of another not in the same employ;" purpose is to prevent a double recovery by injured workman and permit reimbursement to the employer or insurance carrier for compensation paid out.

N.Y.—Berenberg v. Park Memorial Chapel, 142 N.Y.S.2d 845, 286 App. Div. 167.

(2) Section of the compensation law relating to right of an employee injured by a third person, or, in case of death, his dependents, to proceed against the third person has for its purpose to assure to the employee or his dependents at least the benefits to which they would have been entitled under the compensation law.

N.Y.—Bachman v. Fred Seitz, Inc., 4 N.Y.S.2d 653, 254 App.Div. 159, appeal denied, 17 N.E.2d 111, 278 N.Y. 737.

(3) Amendment in 1933 to statute limiting an injured workman's right to sue negligent third parties under certain circumstances was intended to expand, rather than limit, the right to sue.

Or.—Johnson v. Timber Structures, Inc., 231 P.2d 723, 203 Or. 670.

Option as to proof

An injured employee's right to maintain action against negligent third party under workmen's compensation act is limited only by provision giving employee the option of proving amount of indemnity payments made or to be made in lieu of proof of loss of earning capacity and the like for special damages.

Cal.—Pacific Indem. Co. v. California Elec. Works, 84 P.2d 313, 29 C.A.2d 260, followed in Jacques v. Standard Oil Co. of Cal., 84 P.2d 322, 29 C.A.2d 745.

Rights of dependents

(1) Statute authorizes dependent to sue tort-feasor responsible for employee's death or accept compensation, regardless whether such dependent is given cause of action by Lord Campbell's Act.

Md.—Storrs v. Mech, 170 A. 743, 166 Md. 124.

(2) In enforcing liability of third person to dependent of deceased employee, question of primary importance is whether claimant was dependent of deceased employee, since, if he is not a dependent and not a member of the class as defined, he can recover nothing regardless of any pecuniary loss he may have suffered as a result of the death.

Md.—Employers Liability Assur. Corp., for Its Own Use and to Use of Jones v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 195 A. 541, 173 Md. 238.

(3) Under the statute relating to the taking of compensation by an injured employee and the pursuit of the employee's remedy by his dependents against the third party tort-feasor, the term "dependents" is a word of art referring to a defined group of persons who may claim the compensation award.

N.Y.—Lappin v. National Container Corp., 37 N.Y.S.2d 800, 179 Misc. 109.

Applicability of act

Where deceased employee's administratrix brought death action against seller of material to employer and assumed burden of proving that contract of employment was entered into in Iowa, and asserted rights under Iowa workmen's compensation act, it was incumbent on administratrix to bring herself within the act.

U.S.—Raiche v. Standard Oil Co., C. C.A.Iowa, 137 F.2d 446.

49. U.S.—Guerrido v. Alcoa S. S. Co., C.A.Puerto Rico, 234 F.2d 349. Md.—Clough & Molloy v. Shilling, 131 A. 343, 149 Md. 189.

Wrongful death statute

Under provision of compensation law granting dependents of deceased employee election as to whether to accept compensation from employer or sue third party tort-feasor for damages, the action for damages contemplated by compensation law is to be pursued under procedural machinery provided in wrongful death statute.

Ind.—Northern Indiana Power Co. v. West, 32 N.E.2d 713, 218 Ind. 321.

Procedural priorities

Statute providing that employee, or his dependents in case of his death, might proceed against third-party tort-feasor if employer or insurer did not commence an action within two months from an award does not create right of action, but merely creates or preserves right of subrogation for benefit of employer and employee as their interests might appear, and the procedural priorities established are for the protection of those interests alone.

Mich.—Woods v. Ford Motor Co., 70 N.W.2d 739, 342 Mich. 513. 71 C.J. p 1521 note 47.

Other statements of rule

(1) Right of action for negligence against third person with whom party has no contractual relation as employer and employee is not given by workmen's compensation act but is a common-law right previously existent and preserved by such act.

Neb.—Rehn v. Bingaman, 36 N.W. 2d 856, 151 Neb. 196, appeal dismissed 70 S.Ct. 79, 238 U.S. 806, 94 L.Ed. 488, rehearing denied 70 S.

pose liability of such nature for the wrongful death of an employee;⁵¹ and where the employee has no cause of action against the third person as a tort-feasor, any reservation of rights made on claiming compensation is ineffectual.⁵²

Certain acts are so broad in their terms in respect of the exclusiveness of the remedy under the act as to abrogate a right of action as against a third person except as within a proviso saving such rights of action in certain circumstances,⁵³ as where the injury occurs away from the plant of the employer, as discussed infra § 986; and a subsequent amendment of such an act which permits an election to bring an action without reference to the place of the injury has been regarded as giving merely a statutory right of action.⁵⁴ Generally the law as of the time of the accident governs in determining whether the employee's remedy under the compensation act for injury resulting from the negligence of a third person is exclusive,⁵⁵ and statutory provisions pertaining to liability of a third-party tort-feasor to the employee do not become effective retroactively.⁵⁶

Federal Employees' Compensation Act. It has been held or recognized that the Federal Employees' Compensation Act does not render exclusive the remedy given by such act so as to prevent an action by the employee⁵⁷ or by the personal representative of a deceased employee,⁵⁸ and that an action for wrongful death of such employee under a state statute will lie.⁵⁹

Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. While such statute intends the remedy of compensation to be exclusive as against the employer, it does not affect an employee's rights against third persons.⁶⁰ According to some author-

Language used in prior act

In amendment of workmen's compensation act authorizing injured employee or his dependents to claim compensation and proceed at law to recover damages where injury or death for which compensation is payable "shall have been sustained" under circumstances creating in some person other than workmen's compensation fund a liability to pay damages, use of quoted phrase does not give amendment retrospective effect in view of use of the same phrase with like context in original act.

Absence of assignment

Unless an injured federal employee has assigned to the government his right of action against a tort-feasor, the tort-feasor must be held to answer to the employee for injuries actually and proximately flowing from his wrongful act, since there is no privity between the government and the tort-feasor and without the assignment the government is entitled to no part of the amount recovered until a recovery is had, even though the federal compensation act contains a provision enabling the government to compel its employee to prosecute an action in his own name.

Different elements

The elements of a third-party claim under the Longshoremen's Compensation Act are different from those of compensation, in that the latter is absolute liability, whereas the possible liability of a third party is grounded on proof of its negligence.

U.S.—Johnson v. Sword Line, Inc., D.C.Pa., 153 F.Supp. 691.

Absolution

Provision of Longshoremen's Compensation Act absolving an employer from any liability to his employee provided employer has complied with the act does not, in and of itself, absolve a third party tort-feasor from liability to the employee.

U.S.—Cupo v. Isthmian S. S. Co., D. C.N.Y., 56 F.Supp. 45.

Enlargement of rights

Prior to the Longshoremen's Compensation Act, longshoreman had a possible right of action against vessel on which he was injured, against

ity, however, such statute supersedes, and precludes recovery under, a state statute authorizing recovery for wrongful death in respect of the death of an employee, which in general is compensable under such act,⁶¹ even in respect of a cause of action for the benefit of next of kin of a deceased employee, who are not entitled to compensation under the act.⁶² Payment by the employer of a certain amount into a special fund for the death of an employee leaving no surviving dependents entitled to compensation under the statute operates as an assignment to the employer of the cause of action against a third person for the death of the employee and precludes the personal representative of the employee from maintaining a wrongful death action under state statute against such third person.⁶³

Employee's contract with employer not to sue third person. The enforceability of a contract between an employer and an employee which preserves the liability of the employer under the compensation act, but which forbids the employee to sue a third person whom the employer has agreed to indemnify against liability for injury to, or death of, an employee of such employer under certain circumstances, has been recognized.⁶⁴ It has also been held, however, that a contract of this nature is void under a provision of the compensation act casting liability on any third person who negligently causes an employee's death,⁶⁵ and that such a contract does not preclude the employee's distributees from bringing suit against the third person involved for injuries resulting in death.⁶⁶

Duty of employer to disclose facts. The view has been taken that a relation of trust and confidence exists between an employee and his employer requiring the employer to make a full disclosure of the circumstances surrounding the injury suffered by the employee to show who was liable as between the employer and a third person.⁶⁷

Abatement and survival. The general rule that a cause of action for personal injuries abates on the death of the tort-feasor in the absence of a statute providing to the contrary applies to a cause of action by an employee against a person other than the employer, notwithstanding a provision of the compensation act which gives the employer the right to maintain an action to recover the compensation which the employer has paid or has become obligated to pay, against the personal representative of the tort-feasor who caused the injury.⁶⁸ A provision of the compensation act that in all cases of injuries resulting in death, where such injury was sustained in the course of employment, the cause of action shall survive does not refer to the right of action of the widow of a deceased employee to sue for the value of the life of such employee.⁶⁹ Where, however, the compensation act in express terms provides that the making of a lawful claim for compensation shall operate as an assignment of any tort action which the personal representative has against a person other than the employer for death, it has been laid down that, in view of the general rule that any cause of action that is assignable survives, where the widow of a deceased employee received compensation under the act and subsequently died, the cause of action for death survived for the benefit of the employer to the extent of his interest, and to the estate of the widow to the extent of her interest.⁷⁰

§ 984. Elements of Cause or Right of Action by Employee or Dependents; Defenses

The right of action of an injured employee against a third person rests on an actionable tort of such person; but if defendant's negligence is the proximate cause of the injury he is liable regardless of the negligence of the employer of the injured employee or of fellow employees, and an agreement by which the employer of the injured employee was to indemnify defendant in respect of claims for injuries does not necessarily constitute a defense in an action by the injured employee.

The right of action of an employee against a person⁷¹ or the right of action of an employee his immediate employer, or against any one else claimed to be responsible for injuring him, and the change in the law was not intended to reduce his rights but to enlarge them. U.S.—*Rederii v. against a vessel⁷² as a third person rests on an actionable tort of such person or vessel, in the absence of which no recovery against the third person may be had; and this is the rule even where the act provides that, under certain circumstances, if the employee or the dependents of an employee shall bring an action for the recovery of damages against a person who is subject to the act, other than the employer, the amount thereof, the manner in which, and the persons to whom, the same are payable shall be as provided in that part of the act which deals with the award of compensation.⁷³ It is not necessary, however, to show actual negligence of defendant third person himself in order to permit a recovery for the death of an employee; it is sufficient to show that the negligence of an employee of defendant, occurring while such employee was acting in the course of his employment, was the cause of the death.⁷⁴

Ordinarily the liability of the employer or his insurer for workmen's compensation is no defense against the liability of a third party whose negligence caused the injury, either as to the right of recovery or the quantum of recovery,⁷⁵ and it is no defense to an action against a third-party tortfeasor that the employer and its insurance carrier are by statute given an interest in the recovery,⁷⁶ or that the employer has breached a contract to furnish public liability insurance, protecting defendant from claims of the type involved.⁷⁷ Also, a third person responsible for injuries to an employee may not defeat or diminish the recovery by showing negotiations between the compensation insurer and the injured employee as to the disposition of the proceeds of such recovery⁷⁸ or a promise by counsel for the insurer to recommend that suit be not instituted.⁷⁹

Notwithstanding the employer, by electing not to provide and pay compensation under the compensation act, has been deprived of certain defenses in an action by an employee, as discussed supra §§ 939-943, a manager for such employer may be entitled to the common-law defenses of assumed risk⁸⁰ and the tort of a fellow servant⁸¹ in an action by the employee in which the employer and the manager are made defendants. for damages based on an injury or death for which compensation is payable against a person who is subject to the act, a plea setting up facts bringing the case within such statutory provision constitutes a complete defense.⁸² Where an injured employee accepted compensation under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, thus surrendering his claim against the third-party tortfeasor, and the employer's insurance carrier subsequently reassigned the claim against the third party to the employee, such person as the assignee took the assignment subject to any defense against the assigned claim which then existed against the insurance carrier.⁸³

Under some provisions, an action could be prosecuted for an injury caused by an act or omission of a person or corporation other than the employer only where the cause of injury had no direct connection with the employee's regular employment and did not arise out of or necessarily follow as an incident thereof.⁸⁴

Negligence of employer or fellow employees. In an action by an employee⁸⁵ or by the personal representative of a deceased employee for the death of such employee⁸⁶ against a person other than the employer, if defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, then defendant is liable, regardless of the negligence of the employer of the deceased employee or of fellow employees;⁸⁷ and the view has been expressed that the fact that the employer or a fellow employee is a joint tortfeasor is not a defense, either wholly or in diminution of damages, in an action by the employee or his dependents.⁸⁸ Under some statutes, however, the common-law action is preserved for a workman only where the injury was not proximately caused by the employer or his employees and created a legal liability for injury on the part of some person other than the employer;⁸⁹ and there can be no recovery by a parent for the death of a minor employee where the proximate cause of such death is the negligence of the employer and not that of defendant.⁹⁰ The employee of an independent contracting stevedore operating under the Federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act may not hold a vessel liable as a third person where the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the employer.⁹¹

Negligence of fellow employee

(1) In wrongful death action against negligent third party, if it be found that deceased was free from contributory negligence and that defendant's negligence was a proximate cause of the accident, defendant is liable even though the negligence of a fellow employee of deceased was a concurring proximate cause.

which is chargeable to plaintiff constitutes a defense. Where, however, the contributory negligence of plaintiff's fellow employee is not imputed to him, it does not constitute a defense to the action against a third person whose primary negligence caused the injury.⁹⁵

Agreement for indemnity. An agreement by which the employer of the employee who was injured or killed was to indemnify defendant in respect of claims for injuries does not necessarily constitute a defense in an action by the injured employee⁹⁶ or by a dependent of a deceased employee.⁹⁷ In other words, an employee's right to recover against a person other than the employer is not affected by the fact that the third person has entered into a contractual legal relationship with the employer,⁹⁸ and that the employer might eventually be liable to the third person for the damages recovered by the employee.⁹⁹ A provision of the statute that the injured employee's recovery against a third party causing injuries shall be reduced by the amount of contribution or indemnity which the third party has the right to enforce against the employer on payment of any recovery against such third party does not entitle the third party to set up a claim which it has against the employer for contribution or indemnity under a contract made before the injury as a defense to an action for the employee's death.¹

Determination by compensation commission. The determination of the state industrial accident commission that a deceased employee was not in the course of his employment at the time of the accident which caused his death and its dismissal of a petition and claim for compensation do not constitute a defense to an action for the death of such employee brought for the benefit of his widow.²

Necessity for claiming compensation. Under an act which permits an employee to maintain an action against a third person wrongdoer notwithstanding the employee has claimed compensation, the employee is not required to claim compensation before bringing the action.³

Settlement of action; waiver or assignment of claim. The common-law action sanctioned by statute conferring on a compensation claimant the right to sue at common law a third-party tort-feasor is an independent substantive thing, and the right to settle such an action by the employee is integrally a part of the right to bring it.⁴ A statutory provision requiring approval by the court or commissioner of labor of any settlement of an action by an injured employee who was previously awarded workmen's compensation, against a third person responsible for such injury, does not require such approval of an action by administrators of an employee against such third person to recover damages arising out of the employee's death.⁵ An assignment by the injured employee of his claim against a negligent third party, acquired by such third party, may constitute a good defense where the assignment is supported by a good consideration;⁶ and where the employee has settled his claim against the third party and executed a total release, without the formal approval of his employer, such settlement constitutes a defense to a tort action brought by the employee against the third party notwithstanding a provision of statute making a release void when executed without the written consent of both the employer and employee.⁷

Proof of a workmen's compensation claimant's "waiver" of his rights and remedies against another than his employer must be clear and unequivocal;⁸ and until the intention to waive a compensation claimant's rights and remedies against another than his employer is announced by all who must participate therein a "waiver" by any one of them is inchoate and revocable.⁹

a. In General

Third persons who may be liable to an injured employee in a common law action include persons who do not bear the relationship of employer toward the injured employee, or who are not constituted employers by the statute.

As used in provisions of the compensation acts permitting an action of the type here involved, words designating the persons against whom the action may be maintained are given their usual¹⁰ or plain and natural¹¹ meaning, and as so used the phrase "third person,"¹² "third party,"¹³ "other person,"¹⁴ or "other party"¹⁵ usually includes persons who do not bear the relationship of employer toward the injured employee, or who are not constituted employers by the act.¹⁶ A "third person" against whom action is authorized is a person on whom no liability could be entailed under the act,¹⁷

and does not include the employer's insurer.¹⁸ An employee rendering assistance to a third person in an emergency does not become the emergency employee of the third person so as to restrict the employee to workmen's compensation for injuries received by him where the employee had an interest for his employer in relieving the emergency situation.¹⁹

A provision making a principal contractor liable to pay compensation for injuries to a subcontractor's employee to the same extent as the subcontractor has no application to third parties but is limited to principal or intermediate contractors or subcontractors.²⁰ A person in the service of an employer may be transferred with his consent to the service of another for some special purpose, and during his employment with the other he may be a stranger to his original employer so that he may maintain an action at common law for negligence against his original employer.²¹ Where plaintiff sought to recover for injuries sustained in an automobile accident from the owner of the automobile, plaintiff's right of recovery is a statutory one under a statute making the automobile owner liable for negligence of the person operating the automobile with the permission of the owner, and the owner may not defend the action on the ground that plaintiff and the driver were in the employ of a common employer and that at the time of collision were in the scope of their employment so that workmen's compensation was the exclusive remedy.²²

Partner. According to some authority, the workmen's compensation law absolves a partnership as an employer from all other liability for the injury or death of an employee arising out of, and in the course of, employment, and a common-law action for negligence for such injury or death may not be maintained against a member of the partnership individually as owner of the premises where the partnership business was carried on and the employee injured.²³ It has been held, however, that for purposes of the workmen's compensation law a partnership is a legal entity separate from the individual members of the partnership, and where an employee is injured as the result of negligence of a partner he may elect to sue such partner individually as a third party.²⁴

Common employer. Under some statutes all employers who are engaged in various capacities in a common employment under a "common employer" are immune from common-law liability with respect to injuries to the employees engaged in the common employment, since the employees are protected by the compensation insurance of the common employer and the various employers may not be regarded as "persons other than the insured" who are liable to suit;²⁵ but such immunity is granted only where the injury to the employee is compensable,²⁶ and the statute is inapplicable where there is no common employment.²⁷

Owner and lessor of property. Under an act which recognizes the common-law liability of a third person whose negligence causes an injury to an employee, the view has been taken that the owner and lessor of a building, whose only connection with the making of improvements on the building under a contract between the lessee and a contractor is the granting of permission to make such improvements, is not to be treated as an employer of the employees of the contractor and may, therefore, be liable as a third person whose negligence causes the injury.²⁸

Basis of rule

Even though a partnership is itself an employer under the workmen's compensation act, nevertheless, in view of fact that under the law the partners are liable individually for workmen's compensation, an employee of the partnership will be deemed to have surrendered any common-law cause of action in tort which he holds against the partners individually because of a compensable injury.

Carrier

Where contractor engaged in laying pipe for town to be furnished by contractor purchased pipe to be delivered by seller and seller contracted with carrier for delivery of pipe to the job, contractor and carrier were not engaged in "common employment" so as to preclude contractor's insurer after paying compensation to employee of contractor injured while unloading the pipe from enforcing common-law liability of carrier and its employee for negligence causing injury.

tained under circumstances creating legal liability in some person other than the employer has been recognized where there is nothing to show a merger of such corporations.²⁹

Person whose negligence is concurrent with employer. There is authority for the view that the fact that an employer who is within the compensation act is a joint tort-feasor with a third person who causes the injury does not prevent an action against such third person by the employee or the personal representative or dependents of the employee,³⁰ and that the provision of the compensation act that the rights and remedies granted to the employee by the act shall exclude other rights and remedies does not prevent an action against a third person where the injury was caused by the joint and concurrent negligence of such third person and the employer.³¹

b. Employer Acting in Different Capacities or Carrying on Different Businesses

An employer may not be regarded as a third person subject to a common-law action by the employee for an injury incurred while engaged in the work for which he is employed because of the fact that the injury occurs on premises, owned and controlled by the employer, where a business other than that in connection with which the injured employee is employed is carried on.

The fact that the injury occurs on premises, owned and controlled by the employers, where a business other than that in connection with which the injured employee is employed is carried on does not of itself warrant the treatment of the employer as a third person subject to a common-law action by the employee where the injury occurs when the employee is directly engaged in the work for which he is employed.³² So an employer, regardless of his status as owner of the premises where the injury occurred, remains an employer in his relations with his employees as to all matters arising from and connected with their employment and he may not be treated as a dual personality with respect to the right to sue him for negligence.³³ It has been held, however, that the fact that the same management and officers conducted the affairs of two different companies does not preclude the employee of one company from maintaining a negligence action against the other company.³⁴

Claim against municipality. The view has been taken that a municipality may not be regarded as a person "other than the employer" so as to permit an action against it by an employee in one of its departments notwithstanding the injury was caused by the negligence of employees of another department.³⁵

Claim against United States. The right of a person employed by the United States acting in one capacity to a remedy against the United States by an action for damages for an injury sustained by an operation conducted by the United States in another capacity has been recognized notwithstanding the injury is compensable under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act,³⁶ but in such case the necessity for an election by the employee either to seek damages or to take compensation has also been recognized, as discussed infra § 987. The view has been taken, however, that the remedy for compensation under the War Risk Insurance Act for an injury to, or the death of, a soldier or sailor of the United States army or navy is an exclusive remedy and that an action for such injury or death would not lie against the director general of railroads, based on his alleged negligence during the period of operation of railroads under wartime control by the United States.³⁷

c. Third Person Subject to Compensation Act

While under some acts the fact that the employer, the employee, and a third person who caused the injury were all subject to the compensation act does not prevent the maintenance of an action against such third person by the employee, other provisions expressly exempt the third person from suit, or limit the amount of recovery to the amount of compensation prescribed in the act, where the third person is an employer within the compensation act, and other statutory conditions exist.

71 C.J. p 1525 note 2.

Under some acts the fact that the employer, the employee, and a third person who caused the injury were all subject to the compensation act does not prevent the maintenance of an action against such third person by the employee³⁸ or by the personal representative of a deceased employee³⁹ unless, it seems under some acts, the third person is one who is under the act liable to pay compensation to the injured person.⁴⁰

Some statutes, however, limit the amount of recovery to the amount of compensation prescribed in the act in an action by the employee or his personal representative in certain cases in which the employee, his employer, and the third person were all subject to the act. Under such provisions, a common-law action for damages in an unlimited amount may not be prosecuted against a third party where the employer and the third party were both employers under the act and were engaged in due course of business in the furtherance of a "common enterprise" or the accomplishment of a "related purpose."⁴¹ Such a provision limits the negligence liability of third persons to the standard of payment provided by the compensation act only in the case of third persons who are employers insured under the statute,⁴² and whose employees and the employees of an employer who would be required to pay compensation for negligent injuries caused by the third person are working together in the performance of the same project in a manner which exposes them to the same or similar hazards on the premises where the injury occurs and at the time thereof.⁴³ Third persons who are not employers within the coverage of the act may not claim any such limitation of liability for negligence.⁴⁴

Under some statutes there is expressly exempted from the provisions of the act permitting an employee to bring an action against a person not in the same employ the right to bring an action against any employer or any workman as a third person if at the time of the accident such employer or such workman is in the course of any extrahazardous employment under the act. Under such a provision, a third-party employer is immune from suit by a workman when both are covered by the compensation act, in good standing, and when the injury resulted direct from extrahazardous employment in which each was engaged at the time of the accident.⁴⁵ Two requirements have been imposed as conditions for immunity, that is, the employer

43. Minn.—Monson v. Arcand, supra.

Employers held not within statute

(1) Supplier of ready-mixed concrete was not engaged in a "common enterprise" or "related purpose" with building contractor or its subcontractor within provision of workmen's compensation act precluding unlimited recovery in tort action against one engaged in common enterprise or related purpose with injured employee's employer.

Minn.—Swanson v. J. L. Shiely Co., 48 N.W.2d 848, 234 Minn. 548.

(2) Common carrier delivering merchandise to manufacturer was not engaged with manufacturer on same project, even though they joined, through their employees, in unloading merchandise from delivery truck, and therefore manufacturer's employee, who had received workmen's compensation, was not by reason thereof prevented from maintaining common-law tort action, not limited as to damages, against common carrier.

Minn.—Urbanski v. Merchants Motor Freight, 57 N.W.2d 686, 239 Minn. 63.

(3) Common carrier delivering merchandise to consignee was not engaged with consignee on same project, even though their employees joined in unloading merchandise from truck, and therefore carrier's driver, who had received workmen's compensation for injuries sustained while unloading truck, was not, by reason thereof prevented from maintaining common-law tort action not limited as to damages, against consignee and its employee.

Purpose held proper

Amendment to workmen's compensation act providing that no action may be brought against any employer or workman as a third person, if at time of accident such employer or workman was in course of any extrahazardous employment, did not possess a purpose inconsistent with fundamental purposes of the act.

Wash.—Hand v. Greyhound Corp., 299 P.2d 554, 49 Wash.2d 171.

Property damage

Under provision of workmen's compensation statute relating to third-party actions that no action may be brought against any employ-must be a contributor to the workmen's compensation fund and, at the time of the accident, the employee must be in the course of some extrahazardous employment or business then being carried on by the employer; and where such requirements are not met the employer may be held liable to a third-party action.⁴⁶

So a third person is not entitled to immunity from suit, under such a statute, where he is a non-resident engaged solely in interstate commerce and hence is not covered by the compensation act.⁴⁷ Likewise, where the employee is not at the moment of injury engaged in extrahazardous work, an action may be brought against a third-party employer, rather than a claim for compensation.⁴⁸ However, an employer who had complied with the workmen's compensation act may not be penalized by noncompliance with the act by the corporate employer of the workman who was injured because of the alleged negligence of the employer who had complied with the act.⁴⁹ The statute does not bar a er or any workman under statute as a third person if at the time of the accident such employer or such workman was in the course of any extrahazardous employment, immunity extends only to actions for personal injuries and not to property damage.

Meaning of "employment"

Under provision of workmen's compensation act that no actions may be brought against any employer as a third person if at time of accident employer was in course of extrahazardous employment, use of word "employment" was not intended to restrict proviso to actions resulting directly from relationship of employer and employee, since word "employment" in compensation act is synonymous with industry, occupation, work, and business and is used interchangeably with those terms.

Default

(1) A person whose employer or who himself is in default under Washington compensation act and who because of default cannot recover benefits thereof may maintain action against tort-feasor.

U.S.—Calvin v. West Coast Power Co., D.C.Or., 44 F.Supp. 783, applying Washington law.

(2) Where employer engaged in extrahazardous work defaulted in payment of premiums and in submitting required payroll estimates or reports under workmen's compensation act, injured workman not in his employ could maintain common-law action against him, since provision of workmen's compensation act prohibiting workman's action against third-party employers engaged in extrahazardous work was subject to provision depriving defaulting employers of benefit of the act.

Wash.—Reeder v. Crewes, 90 P.2d 267, 199 Wash. 40.

(3) Employer, who was making payments into industrial accident fund on his employees, who was not in default in payment of premiums or in submitting required payroll estimates, and who was engaged in extrahazardous employment, at time his negligent act caused injury to workman, not in his employment, but entitled to benefits under workmen's compensation law, was not subject to suit by such workman, and fact that employer failed to carry himself on his payroll reports to department of labor and industry, and failed to qualify himself to receive benefits as workman in event of injury to himself, was immaterial.

(4) Under provision of the workmen's compensation act respecting filing of reports by employers with department of labor and industries, considerable discretion is vested in the director as what should be included and be omitted from the reports and the reports are required to furnish the department with the data for the accomplishment of the collection and payment functions and are not for the protection of the employees so as to give an employee engaged in extrahazardous employment a common-law cause of action against a third-party tort-feasor failing to file required reports.

Negligence connected with employment

Requirement that employer must have been engaged in extrahazardous employment at time of accident to render him immune from suit by workman not in his employ requires that employer's negligent act or omission must arise out of or be in some way connected with an extrahazardous employment or business then being carried on by employer.

49. Wash.—Koreski v. Seattle Hardware Co., 135 P.2d 860, 17 Wash.2d 421.

Person not carried on pay roll

Where electric motor service corporation, which was within extrahazardous employment classification, contracted to repair machinery of hardware company, whose operation of power-driven machinery brought it within extrahazardous employment classification, and manager of the service corporation was injured while supervising or personally assisting in the repair work, the manager was a "workman" within the workmen's compensation act and could not maintain personal injury action against the hardware company even though the service corporation failed to carry him on its pay roll and make report to department

common-law action by a self-employed individual for negligence causing him injury unless he has qualified himself for benefits as and under the same circumstances and subject to the same obligations as a workman.⁵⁰

In Illinois. Under statutory provisions formerly in effect, where the employer, the employee, and a third person whose negligence caused the injury were all bound by the act and the injury was compensable under the act, in general the employee⁵¹ or the personal representative of a deceased employee⁵² could not maintain an action against such third person; the right was transferred to the employer who paid the compensation fixed by the act, and the amount of his recovery was limited by the amount of compensation payable under the act for the injury or death of the employee, as discussed infra § 1039. On the other hand, the common-law right of action of an employee⁵³ or the right of action of the personal representative of a deceased employee⁵⁴ for an injury to, or the death of, the employee against a person other than the employer, who caused the injury or death, was not affected by the compensation act where such other person was not bound by the provisions of the act. Such provisions were held invalid,⁵⁵ and not to preclude maintenance of a common-law action against a third person whether such person became bound by the compensation act through election or through compulsion.⁵⁶

Under the statute which was formerly in effect, the fact that the person who caused the injury was, as to his own employees, within the provisions of the act did not, of itself entitle such person to the protection of such provisions,⁵⁷ and the mere fact that the injured employee, his employer, and the third person were within the operation of the act did not prevent the maintenance of an action for damages against such third person.⁵⁸ Thus the right to bring the action, otherwise maintainable, existed where the act which caused the injury did not arise out of any employment within the act in which the third person was engaged,⁵⁹ or where the injury occurred in the conduct of a part of the business of the third person which was not within the act;⁶⁰ nor did the provisions in question pre-of labor and industries that the manager was carried on pay roll.

Independent contractor

Where junk company employed decedent and his copartners as independent contractors to remove equipment from abandoned railroad over whose right of way power company maintained uninsulated transmission line, decedent, who was electrocuted by the line, was not a "workman" within Washington compensation act, and hence decedent's beneficiary could maintain action under Washington wrongful death statute.

Who are employers within act in general see supra §§ 42-58.

Seller

Where trucking company's driver was injured, allegedly due to seller's negligence, while voluntarily helping load the truck, seller was not driver's "principal employer" who would be liable to trucker for workmen's compensation if trucking company, as the "immediate employer," had not paid the compensation, and therefore the trucker was not barred by the workmen's compensation act from maintaining an action against the seller for the injuries received.

Statutory employee

(1) Under provision of compensation act relating to liability of principal to employees of an independent contractor, the principal is considered the employer of contractor's employees so that right to compensation is their exclusive remedy and principal is not liable to contractor's employees in tort.

Va.—Kramer v. Kramer, 100 S.E.2d 37, 199 Va. 409.

Intent of statute

(1) The workmen's compensation statutes manifest intent to bring within the compensation act all persons engaged in any work that is part of the trade, business, or occupation of original party who undertakes as owner, or contracts as contractor, to perform that work, and to make liable to every employee engaged in that work, every such owner or contractor and subcontractor above such employee, but to except, and preserve common-law remedy against, any employer reached in the ascending scale of whose trade, business, or occupation, the work is not a part.

Va.—Sykes v. Stone & Webster Engineering Corp., 41 S.E.2d 469, 186 Va. 116.

(2) Purpose of statute requiring insurer of employer of independent contractor to pay compensation to independent contractor's employees performing work which is part of employer's business is to prevent employer from avoiding application of workmen's compensation act by letting out the work to independent contractor, and such employees, being covered by insurance of employer, have no right of action against employer to recover for injuries arising out of, and in course of, their employment in such work.

Mass.—Dubois v. Soule Mill, 32 N. E.2d 886, 323 Mass. 472.

Where relationship of principal employer and contractor did not exist between building owner and firm examining the premises, the building owner was not liable to pay compensation for the injury or death of employee of firm and an action based on negligence could not be maintained against building owner.

72. U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Wallace, C.A.Va., 172 F.2d 802.

The customary practice of a person or corporation in carrying on its business has a material bearing on whether a particular activity is a "part of or process in" the "trade or business" or "merely ancillary and incidental" thereto within the meaning of the compensation act so as to permit recovery at common law for death of employee of contractor.

Mass.—Caton v. Winslow Bros. & Smith Co., 34 N.E.2d 633, 309 Mass. 150—Cozzo v. Atlantic Refining Co., 12 N.E.2d 744, 299 Mass. 260.

Performance of commercial functions of owner

Work which ordinarily would be performed by owner's own employees in the prosecution of owner's business, or as an essential part in maintenance of business, is part of owner's "trade, business, or occupation" within Virginia workmen's compensation act making owner liable as a third party for negligence of owner causing injury to employee of person employed by owner to do work for owner, unless work is part owner's trade, business, or occupation, but quoted phrase does not include work not directly entering into performance of the commercial function of owner but only affording the facilities for conduct of owner's commercial function.

U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Wallace, C.A.Va., 172 F.2d 802.

Construction of new building

Although the construction of a new building for use in manufacturing or merchandising goods may not ordinarily be a "part of or process in" the "trade or business" of a person or corporation engaged in such manufacturing or merchandising within the meaning of the compensation act so as to preclude recovery at common law for death of employee of contractor, it does not follow that such a person or corporation may not adopt the general practice of constructing new buildings for use as outlets for the distribution of its products so that the construction thereof becomes an integral part of its business and not "merely ancillary or incidental" thereto.

whether the remedy is by tort action or under the workmen's compensation act, the test is the right of control with respect to the work done and the manner of performing it.⁷⁴

Principal employer's injury to employee of subcontractor. Under some acts, where a principal employer procures work to be done by a contractor, or through him by a subcontractor, and such work is a part or process in the trade or business of such principal contractor and is performed in, on, or about premises under the control of such principal contractor, such principal employer becomes absolutely liable for the payment of compensation to the employees involved if such principal employer has accepted the act, and an employee of a subcontractor may not, it seems, maintain an action for damages against such principal employer for an injury for which such employer is otherwise liable.⁷⁵

Where, however, the work involved is not a part or process in the trade or business of the principal employer, performed on his premises, the right of an employee of a subcontractor to maintain an action against such employer has been recognized.⁷⁶

Under a statute making a "principal or intermediate contractor or subcontractor" liable for compensation to an employee injured while in the employ of any of his subcontractors and engaged on the subject matter of the contract, the quoted words do not include an owner for whom buildings were being erected by contractors and subcontractors.⁷⁷ Where a subcontractor provided compensation coverage for his employees, an employee may not sue as a third party the owner of property who had contracted for the work, under a provision imposing such direct liability if the contractor fails to provide compensation coverage.⁷⁸

Intent of statute

The Virginia workmen's compensation act making owner liable as a third party for negligence of owner causing injury to employee of person employed by owner to do work for owner, unless work is part of owner's trade, business, or occupation, is intended to protect employees of financially irresponsible subcontractors, and to prevent employers from relieving themselves of liability for compensation by doing through independent contractors what they would otherwise do through direct employees, and was not intended to relieve employers from liability for their own negligence which causes injury to employees of independent contractors engaged in work for employers outside scope of employers' occupation. U.S.—Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Wallace, C.A.Va., 172 F.2d 802.

Equipment for operation

Argument that principal is not relieved from liability under common law for injuries to independent contractor's employee on ground that his remedy is under workmen's compensation act simply because such contractor's work may be required to equip principal's trade or business for operation is inapplicable where work involved is part of principal's trade or business.

Work not a part of trade or business

(1) The making of extensive alterations on storage warehouse was not a part of the "trade, business, or occupation" of a seller of merchandise leasing the warehouse for storage purposes within the Virginia workmen's compensation act, so as to create compensation liability to an employee of the subcontractor sustaining injuries while making alterations and preclude a common-law action by him against the seller for injuries sustained.

ployer, so as to be barred from maintaining tort action against railroad company for injuries arising in course of such work.

Conn.—King v. Palmer, 30 A.2d 549, 129 Conn. 636.

(2) General, Principal, or Original Contractor

While a general contractor has been regarded as a "third person" liable to suit for injuries to an employee of a subcontractor, under some statutes, where the general contractor is liable for workmen's compensation to an employee of a subcontractor, the employee cannot maintain an action for damages against the general contractor.

With respect to injuries to an employee of a subcontractor, a general contractor has been regarded as a "third person" within the meaning of a provision of the act which permits an action at law against a "third person" causing the injury or death of the employee.⁷⁹ Under some acts, however, where a principal or general contractor⁸⁰ or his in-

N.J.—Parker v. Zanghi, 131 A.2d 802, 45 N.J.Super. 167, applying Pennsylvania law.

Meeting of obligation

In action by alleged employee of subcontractor against owner of premises and power company for injuries sustained from an electric wire, general contractor as third-party defendant had good defense to extent that it had met its obligation in full toward employee under compensation law.

U.S.—Gallagher v. General Mach. Co., D.C.Pa., 9 F.R.D. 824.

Employees engaged in common enterprise

(1) Amended section of workmen's compensation act, providing that all of general contractor's and subcontractor's employees, engaged on con-suror⁸¹ is liable for compensation under the act to an employee of a subcontractor, such employee cannot maintain an action for damages against the general contractor.

Thus, where the act renders the general or principal contractor absolutely liable for compensation for an injury to, or the death of, an employee of a subcontractor, an action for damages for such injury⁸² or death⁸³ against the general or principal contractor who has caused the injury and has complied with, or accepted, the act may not be maintained; and this is the rule notwithstanding another provision of the act which permits the maintenance of an action for damages against a person other than the employer⁸⁴ or against a person not in the same employ,⁸⁵ where the injury is caused by such person, in the absence of a showing which takes the case out of the operation of the act.⁸⁶

It has been stated broadly, however, that the provision of an act that any contractor shall, in the event of the subcontractor's failing to carry workmen's compensation insurance as required by the act, become liable for compensation does not impair any of the common-law rights of an employee of the subcontractor⁸⁷ or relieve the general contractor from liability for damages caused by his own negligence,⁸⁸ on the theory that the purpose of such provision is to protect the employee of the subcontractor.⁸⁹ It has been held that even where the subcontractor failed to procure compensation insurance, thus imposing a secondary liability on the general contractor, the latter may not claim immunity from a common-law action for negligence.⁹⁰

Where by the terms of the act the principal or general contractor is not liable for compensation for an injury to, or the death of, an employee of a subcontractor under the particular circumstances in-

tract work, shall be deemed employed in same business or establishment, and that contractor shall secure payment of compensation to all such employees, abrogates common law to extent of making all employees engaged in common enterprise fellow servants entitled to equal benefits under such act without resorting to common-law action, and brings within its provisions all claims for compensation for injuries arising out of and in course of employment by common employer. Fla.—Frantz v. McBee Co., 77 So.2d 796—Younger v. Giller Contracting Co., 196 So. 690, 143 Fla. 335.

(2) Protection of a general contractor's compensation insurance extends to all workmen on the job whether or not employed immediately by the general contractor or employer, at least if they are not otherwise protected by insurance, and such general contractor or employer and all persons or corporations engaged on the job as employees or independent contractors are also insured and are granted immunity against actions at law brought by or in the right of other employees so engaged.

Existence of liability as decisive

(1) Under provisions of workmen's compensation act declaring in effect that an employer, within meaning of act, must secure payment of compensation to its employees, and that a contractor who sublets work shall be deemed the employer of the subcontractor for purpose of securing payment of compensation, it is not the providing of the compensation that gives immunity from suit by employee of a subcontractor on theory that contractor is a third-party tortfeasor, but it is the existence of the liability, vel non, to secure compensation which gives the employer immunity.

Fla.—Jones v. Florida Power Corp., 72 So.2d 285.

(2) Where payment of compensation is secured by general contractor, either directly or through subcontractor, a recovery for injury arising out of and in course of contract work is exclusively under compensation act.

Subcontractors not complying with act

Under Michigan law, a general contractor is only held to the limited employer's liabilities under the act, and may not be sued in a personal injury action, if he lets his work to subcontractors who do not comply with, or who are not covered by, the act, since in such case he is liable for compensation.

volved,⁹¹ as, for example, where the subcontractor pays, or secures payment of, compensation to the employee,⁹² the right to maintain an action against the principal or general contractor for his negligence or wrong has been recognized; but under some statutes a common-law action for damages against the general contractor may not be maintained where the subcontractor has secured the payment of compensation.⁹³ Likewise an employee of a subcontractor may maintain an action against the general contractor for an injury caused by the negligence of the general contractor where the general contractor has not secured the payment of compensation to such employee.⁹⁴

Under some acts where the principal contractor has rejected the provisions of the act for elective compensation, an employee of a subcontractor may maintain an action against the principal contractor for an injury caused by the latter,⁹⁵ notwithstanding the subcontractor has accepted the act and taken out insurance.⁹⁶

(3) Subcontractor

Some acts allow an action to be brought against a subcontractor for an injury to the employee of the general contractor caused by negligence chargeable to such subcontractor, or for injury to the employee of another subcontractor; but according to other authority, a subcontractor is not an "other party" than the employer so as to permit the bringing of a tort action against him by the employee of the principal contractor.

Some acts do not prevent an action against a subcontractor for an injury to the employee of the general contractor caused by negligence chargeable to such subcontractor,⁹⁷ at least where the so-called subcontractor is in fact an independent contractor in so far as the control of the work is concerned,⁹⁸ and a subcontractor whose negligence is the cause of an injury to an employee of the general or principal contractor has been regarded as a "third person"⁹⁹ or a person other than the employer¹ within the meaning of a provision of the act permit-

Employee not covered by act

Statute providing that, where a general contractor is covered by the Massachusetts workmen's compensation act and a covered employee is injured by the negligence of a subcontractor engaged in common employment, then the general contractor's insurer may not maintain in the name of injured employee an action against subcontractor, does not bar an employee not covered by the Massachusetts act from an action of tort against subcontractor engaged in common employment.

U.S.—Bagnet v. Springfield Sand & Tile Co., D.C.Mass., 64 F.Supp. 768.

An independent contractor is not an "employee" against whom workmen's compensation act does not authorize action for injuries caused by his negligence to general contractor's employee, even though independent contractor is in general contractor's general employment, since "employee," in such situation, means one under his immediate employer's direct supervision and control.

Common employment

Construction company which was allegedly a subcontractor on project on which county was the principal, was a third person against whom a suit would lie by an employee of the county for injuries occasioned by negligence of the subcontractor's employee, even though the employees were engaged in common employment.

ting an action for damages against such person for an injury caused by him.

The right to maintain such action is not defeated by another provision of the act which renders the principal contractor liable for compensation to an employee of a subcontractor,² but it has also been held that, under a provision imposing on the general contractor the obligation of securing equal benefits to the contractor's and subcontractor's employees engaged in the common enterprise, the subcontractor, as well as the general contractor, is immune from common-law liability to employees injured in work on the common enterprise.³ According to other authority, a subcontractor is not an "other party" than the employer so as to permit the bringing of a tort action against him by an employee of the principal contractor;⁴ and, under provisions of statute authorizing actions against third parties who are not in the same employment as the claimant, the representative of an employee has no cause of action against a subcontractor who had employed the employee, but who had permitted compensation insurance to terminate so that under the compensation act the employee was an employee of the principal contractor.⁵

Subcontractor causing injury to employee of another subcontractor. The right of an employee of a subcontractor to maintain an action against another subcontractor, under the same general contractor, has been recognized notwithstanding the employee's right to claim compensation under the act.⁶ According to other authority, where injuries suffered by the employee of a subcontractor involve the negligence of employees of another subcontractor under the same general contractor, the remedy under the workmen's compensation act is exclusive since such employees, whether employed by the subcontractor or general contractor, are deemed to be statutory fellow servants;⁷ but such result follows only where it appears that the general contractor has secured payment of workmen's compensation either directly or indirectly through the subcontractor,⁸ and where the contractor and employee involved are engaged in work covered by a common contract.⁹

While an independent contractor or subcontractor engaged on a common job for a common employer insured under the statute is not a "person other than the insured" under the compensation statute permitting an action at law to be brought against such a party,¹⁰ immunity from suit at common law does not apply where there is no common employer of the two independent contractors whose employees are involved in an accident or injury.¹¹

"Same employ"

Employees of separate independent contractors under the same general contractor who were engaged in performing distinct tasks for which they were hired, although they were cooperating to accomplish a joint result, were not persons in the "same employ" within workmen's compensation act authorizing workman injured by negligence or wrong of another not in the "same employ" to pursue common-law remedy against such person.

Other statement of rule

The protection of a general con-

tractor's compensation insurance extends to all workmen on the job whether or not employed immediately by the general contractor or employer, at least if they are not otherwise protected by insurance, and such general contractor or employer and all persons or corporations engaged on the job as employees, independent contractors or subcontractors, irrespective of whether such independent contractors or subcontractors are also insured, are granted immunity against actions at law brought by or in the right of other employees so engaged.

A group of independent contractors insured under the compensation act is not an adequate substitute for a "common employer insured under the act" whose existence under compensation statute, gives the work as a whole, the character of a "common job or employment" within the scope of which, actions at law for damages for injuries cannot be brought between persons engaged thereon as employees or independent contractors or subcontractors, even though insurance in combination, covers all employees on the work which is being done for an owner of property.

Mass.—Pimental v. John E. Cox Co., supra.

The erection of a freight terminal was not a "part or process in" the "trade or business" of freight forwarding company's work but was "ancillary and incidental" to such work within compensation statute providing that employees of noninsured subcontractors should be covered by contractor's compensation insurance if the subcontractor's work was a part of process in the trade or business of the contractor and was not ancillary and incidental to such work, so that freight forwarding company was not, under compensation statute, a "common employer" of independent contractors who erected terminal, with respect to right of injured employee of one of the contractors to recover for insurer which compensated injured employee, from other contractor whose employee's negligence caused the injury.

e. Employee or Agent of Employer of Injured Workman

Under some acts the common-law tort liability of an employee to his coemployee is not abrogated notwithstanding the employer's liability for compensation; but by the terms of other statutes an employee of one who is operating under the act has no right of action against any agent, servant, or employee of such employer.

Some of the acts do not abrogate the common-law liability of an employee to his coemployee¹² or an employee's liability for the death of a coemployee,¹³ notwithstanding the employer is liable for compensation;¹⁴ and provisions of the act constituting the remedies or relief thereunder exclusive do not prevent an action by the employee against a coemployee¹⁵ or an action by the injured employee against an agent of the employer.¹⁶ So a provision subrogating the employer to the rights of the employee against a third person does not prevent such action by the injured employee.¹⁷

Furthermore, such coemployee has been regarded as a "third person" or "third party" against whom the act recognizes the right of the injured employee to maintain an action,¹⁸ and a foreman under whom the injured employee works has been regarded as a "third person" within the meaning of the provision of the act expressly permitting an action against a third person who is himself liable.¹⁹ So an agent of the employer²⁰ and an officer of a corporate employer²¹ is "a person other than the employer" within the meaning of some statutes which permit the maintenance of an action against such person, and the chief of a municipal fire department has been regarded as a "party other than the employer" in respect of an assistant chief who was injured.²²

By the terms of some statutes, however, an employee of one who is operating under the act has no right of action against any agent, servant, or employee of such employer.²³ Under a provision permitting, under certain circumstances, an injured

Person conducting business

(1) The phrase "those conducting his business" as used in provision of workmen's compensation law that employer who accepts compensation provisions shall secure payment of compensation to his employees and that while such security remains in force he or those conducting his business shall only be liable to any employee who elects to come under law for injury or death by accident to extent specified in law, includes any person who, as an employee of a covered employer, was performing any work incident to employer's business, regardless of whether employed in a menial, supervisory, or managerial capacity.

(3) An officer or agent of a corporation, who is acting within scope of his authority for and on behalf of corporation, and whose acts are such as to render corporation liable therefor, is among those conducting business of corporation, within purview of immunity clause of compensation act, and entitled to immunity it gives.

Extrahazardous "employment"

Under provision of workmen's compensation act that no actions may be brought against any workman as a third person if at time of accident workman was in course of extrahazardous employment, use of word "employment" was not intended to restrict proviso to actions resulting directly from relationship of employer and employee, since word "employment" in compensation act is synonymous with industry, occupation, work, and business and is used interchangeably with those terms.

Person other than employer

Compensation act provision giving injured employee or his personal representative right to recover damages for such injury, loss of service, or death from any "person other than employer" means any other person or party who is a stranger to employment but whose negligence contributed to injury and does not authorize injured employee to maintain action at law against officer, agent, or employee conducting business of employer whose negligence caused injury.

Persons held not in same employ

In New York

(1) By express provision of the statute, the right to compensation is the exclusive remedy of an employee when he is injured by the wrong of another in the same employ, and the accident happened within the scope of the injured employee's employment.

(2) Employee may not waive right to compensation, in order to bring personal injury action against fellow employee merely because he was an infant.

N.Y.—Traynor v. Plattsburgh Coop. G. L. F. Service, 151 N.Y.S.2d 854, 2 A.D.2d 617, appeal denied 154 N.Y. S.2d 432, 2 A.D.2d 795.

(3) In determining meaning of term in the same "employ" as used in section of the workmen's compensation law barring employee's right of action for injuries resulting from negligence of another in the same right to bring an action except as provided in the act, an action by an injured employee against a superintendent under whom such employee worked has been dismissed on the ground that it was not shown that the case was within one of the exceptions.²⁶

A provision barring an action by an injured employee against his fellow employee for damages resulting from the latter's negligence applies only when the negligence of a fellow employee was the sole proximate cause of the injury or death;²⁷ and if the negligence of a third-party defendant was a proximate cause of the accident, defendant is liable even though the negligence of a fellow employee of deceased was a concurrent proximate cause, as discussed supra § 984. In order to render applicable a provision of the workmen's compensation law barring an employee's action for an injury resulting from negligence of another in the same "employ," the employee must have sustained an injury in the course of his employment and the coemployee causing the injury must have been in the course of his employment by the same employer.²⁸ If the injured employee was not in the course of employment at the time of the accident, so that it would not be compensable under the statute, he may recover against a fellow employee whose negligence caused the accident.²⁹

The workmen's compensation law does not afford a defense based on the exclusive remedy of compensation provided for one injured by the negligence or wrong of another in the same employ, to the perpetrator of an assault arising out of a quarrel between coemployees relating to matters connected with the employment, although the claimant's injuries might be compensable as an industrial accident so far as the employer is concerned.³⁰ The statute does not furnish a defense to one guilty of intentional tort as distinguished from mere carelessness.³¹ It has been held that a defense that plaintiff and defendant are coemployees may not be raised where the liability of defendant, constituting the basis of the action, is statutory and not dependent on any wrongdoing or negligence under the workmen's compensation law.³²

f. Vessel

Under provisions of statute permitting an action against a third person liable for the injury, a vessel owned by one other than an independent contracting stevedore by whom the injured employee was employed may be treated as a "third person," and the employee may proceed against such vessel where the vessel would otherwise be liable.

"employ" and providing a right of action against another not in the same "employ," purpose and effect of the law as a whole must be considered; word "employ" as so used has merely ordinary and usual meaning as synonymous with "employment."

Use of employee's car

(1) Where motorist was giving a fellow employee a ride in motorist's own car, not as a duty but as a favor, such ride was not an incident of the employment and motorist and guest were not "in the same employ" within meaning of provision of workmen's compensation law denying recovery for injury due to negligence of another "in the same employ."

Under the provision of the federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act permitting an action against a third person liable for the injury, a vessel owned by one other than an independent contracting stevedore by whom the injured employee was employed may be treated as a "third person," and the employee may proceed against such vessel where such vessel would otherwise be liable,³³ notwithstanding the provision of the act making the liability of the employer for compensation under the act exclusive.³⁴ However, a vessel owned by the employer of a stevedore who is injured while at work on such vessel is not a "third person" within the meaning of such provision,³⁵ and in such case the provision for exclusive liability prevents a proceeding against the vessel.³⁶

§ 986. Liability of Third Person Dependent on Place of Injury

Where so provided by statute, a negligent third party responsible for injuries to a workman may not be sued at common law where such party, or his workman causing the injury was, at the time thereof, on premises over which he had joint supervision and control with the employer of the injured workman, where the third party and the workman's employer were engaged in furtherance of a common enterprise or in the accomplishment of the same or related purposes, and where the third party was, at the time, an employer subject to the compensation act.

Under some statutes an injured workman may not sue a negligent third party at common law where such party or his workman causing the injury was, at the time of the injury, on premises over which he had joint supervision and control with the employer of the injured workman, where the third party and the workman's employer were engaged in furtherance of a common enterprise or in the accomplishment of the same or related purposes, and where the third party was, at the time, an employer subject to the compensation act.³⁷ The term "joint supervision and control" within such a statute means more than a mere right of supervision as to results, and means an active participation in the work at hand;³⁸ and the term "premises" as used in the statute should not be confined within a small perimeter, but should be extended to the entire area wherein the work resulting in injury was in progress.³⁹ In order to become "engaged in the furtherance of a common enterprise," within the statute, it is not essential that the workmen formally enter into an agreement to that effect; it is only necessary that they occupy the same premises and perform component parts of a general undertaking.⁴⁰ The statute is applicable to an action at law to recover damages for assault and battery.⁴¹

In a few states there were formerly in effect provisions permitting an injured employee or the dependents of a deceased employee to maintain an action against a person not in the same employ for an injury or death which occurred away from the plant of the employer, but denying the right to maintain such action where the injury occurred at such plant.⁴² Such a provision was required to be given the same liberal construction in favor of

Where plaintiff's employer and defendants were separately engaged in business of hauling logs over the Oregon coast highway and all parties concerned were subject to workmen's compensation law, the highway did not constitute "premises" within compensation law precluding a third party action when parties are engaged in common enterprise and have control of premises where injury occurred so as to preclude plaintiff from maintaining action against defendants for injuries resulting from defendants' negligence on the highway.

While the question as to what constitutes "the plant of the employer" within the meaning of such a provision was governed by the terms of the act where it defined what such "plant" shall include,⁴⁴ in some of the cases certain general rules were laid down in construing the provision in question, and the view was taken that the boundaries of the "plant" must be inflexible and limited.⁴⁵ So the right of control over the place where the injury occurred was held important,⁴⁶ and it was asserted that the "plant" did not include more than that part of the employer's fixed property of which he had exclusive control,⁴⁷ but that it did include a place which was a part of the fixed property of the employer, where, in so far as the operations involved were concerned, the employer had exclusive control and could provide means for the protection of his employees,⁴⁸ regardless of whether the place was actually on the real estate of another than the employer.⁴⁹

In respect of a public street or highway, the "plant" of an employer did not include that portion in which the traveling public had at least equal rights with the employer and over which the employer had no oversight and no means of protecting his employees from the negligent or wrongful acts of third persons,⁵⁰ and did not include that portion which was reserved and kept open for the use of the public,⁵¹ but the mere fact that the place in question was within the limits of a dedicated street did not prevent such place from being a part of the "plant" of an employer so as to exclude an action against a third person where the employer had exclusive control of such place in so far as the operations involved were concerned and could provide means for the protection of his employees.⁵²

The "plant" of a municipal corporation which was an employer included a particular portion of the street or highway where in respect thereof it had control, could, for purposes of repair, exclude the public therefrom, and could take the steps necessary to insure the safety of its employees while engaged thereon.⁵³ As affecting the right to bring an action against a third person, the court refused to construe the act as requiring a determination that the "plant" of the employer accompanied the employee wherever he would go to perform services for his employer.⁵⁴

b. Election of Remedies

Unless provided otherwise by statutory or constitutional provision, an employee injured under such circumstances as to afford him a right to compensation as against his employer, and also to impose a liability in damages on a third person, is not required to elect whether he will seek compensation or damages, and the fact that he has received compensation under the act, or settled a claim therefor, does not prevent the maintenance of an action against the third-party tort-feasor.

By the provisions of some compensation acts, presently or formerly in force, an employee injured under such circumstances as to afford him a right to compensation as against his employer, and also to impose a liability in damages on a third person, has a right to elect whether he will seek compensation or damages;⁵⁵ he cannot recover both

Control of action

Once an employee has made a valid binding election to accept compensation under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act he has no further control over the cause of action against the third person whose negligence caused the injury.

U.S.—Johnsen v. American-Hawaiian S. S. Co., C.C.A.Cal., 98 F.2d 847.

Failure of employer to bring action

An employee could not maintain action against tort-feasor negligently injuring him where he had accepted compensation paid by employer, notwithstanding employer's failure to bring action against the tort-feasor.

U.S.—Currant v. Eastern S. S. Lines, D.C.Mass., 77 F.Supp. 9, affirmed, C.A., 170 F.2d 148.

Injury arising out of employment

Injured employee cannot maintain action against third-party tort-feasor for damages after receiving compensation under Montana workmen's compensation act, if cause of injury was directly connected with and arose out of, or necessarily followed as incident of, regular employment.

Revocation

Where longshoreman was injured on vessel of defendant and elected to take compensation from the stevedoring company which was paid to him, and subsequently he brought suit against the defendant as third-party tort-feasor, and he failed to secure an assignment of the cause of action from the stevedoring company or its insurer, and there was no showing that the insurer purported to bargain away any rights of the longshoreman, who failed to file the election to sue the third-party, longshoreman was not entitled to revoke such election because he believed it would be profitable for him to do so.

compensation is not a defense to an action for damages.⁶⁰ So the election of an employee to take compensation will not bar his suit against third parties, where there is no other procedure by which he may procure his statutory share in the proceeds, if any, of his rights of action against third parties.⁶¹

In the absence of a statutory or constitutional requirement, an employee is not required to make an election,⁶² and it is generally the rule that the fact that he has received compensation under the act, or settled a claim therefor, does not prevent the maintenance of an action against a third person who caused the injury.⁶³ Some provisions in terms

Consistent remedies

Liability of an employer and surety for compensation is separate and distinct from that of the third-party tort-feasor for damages, and employee's remedies of claiming compensation or obtaining damages against third person by action of law are not inconsistent.

Idaho.—Lake v. State, 227 P.2d 361, 71 Idaho 107.

Satisfaction

The amount of compensation received by injured employee under Ohio workmen's compensation law may not be considered as pro tanto satisfaction of recovery to which he is entitled in action at law against third-party tort-feasor.

U.S.—Dearhouse v. Bethlehem Steel Co., D.C.Ohio, 118 F.Supp. 936.

Compromise settlement

(1) An injured employee's release of his self-insured employer from all claims of employee under Ohio workmen's compensation law in consideration of employer's payment of agreed sum in compromise settlement, approved by industrial commission, of employee's disputed claims for total and permanent partial disability and facial disfigurement, did not discharge third-party tort-feasor from liability for employee's injuries, in absence of proof that such payment was in full satisfaction for injuries.

U.S.—Dearhouse v. Bethlehem Steel Co., supra.

(2) If workman was acting in course of his employment when he was killed, release of all causes of action against employer would do no more than give employer what he would be entitled to by operation of law upon finding that injury was compensable as industrial injury; and third party would not be released by fact that compromise agreement, in addition to releasing compensation claim, also released employer from all causes of action arising from injury.

Cal.—Lamoreux v. San Diego & A. E. Ry. Co., 311 P.2d 1, 48 C.2d 617.

A release of all claims for compensation does not bar an action by the injured workman for damages against a third-party tort-feasor.

Exclusive or concurrent right as between employer or insurers and employee or dependents to sue and recover see infra § 1003.

Purpose of statute

(1) Amendment of workmen's compensation act so as to abolish requirement that injured employee make an election to take compensation or pursue his action at law against third-party tort-feasor was adopted in order to correct evils and injustices which had become apparent from actual operation and administration of the act as a result of inconsistent positions in which insurance companies were placed under prior act as both compensation and liability insurers.

Fla.—Fidelity & Cas. Co. of N. Y. v. Bedingfield, 60 So.2d 489.

(2) Where original workmen's compensation law permitted injured employee to proceed either against third-party tort-feasor or against employer but not against both, amendment, which permitted employee to recover compensation benefits and thereafter to proceed against third-party tort-feasors, did not create the right of action of employee injured by tort-feasor but merely deprived tort-feasor of a defense that might have been available to him under provisions of the law previously enforced.

Mich.—Woods v. Ford Motor Co., 70 N.W.2d 739, 342 Mich. 518.

(3) Under statute providing that injured employee's right of action against third person shall not be affected by payment of compensation by employer, legislature intended that the wrongdoer should not benefit by payment of compensation made to injured employee by employer, and that he should not be permitted to benefit from payments made by persons who were not joint tort-feasors, whether motive impelling the payment be affection, philanthropy, or contract.

Conn.—Stuljinski v. Cizauskas, 5 A. 2d 10, 125 Conn. 293.

Construction

Section of workmen's compensation act as amended in 1951 so as to permit injured employee to claim compensation benefits and at the same time institute suit against third-party tort-feasor is plain and unambiguous and should be construed within its four corners.

Fla.—Fidelity & Cas. Co. of N. Y. v. Bedingfield, 60 So.2d 489.

Prospective or retroactive operation

(1) Where original workmen's compensation law permitted injured employee to proceed either against third-party tort-feasor or against employer but not against both, amendment, which permitted employee to recover compensation benefits and thereafter to proceed against third-party tort-feasors, did not in any way impair vested rights and was intended by the legislature to have a retroactive effect.

Mich.—Muskegon Hardware & Supply Co. for Use and Benefit of Hardware Mut. Cas. Co. v. Green, 72 N.W.2d 52, 348 Mich. 340—Wood v. Ford Motor Co., 70 N.W. 2d 739, 342 Mich. 518—Horn v. Davis, 65 N.W.2d 793, 340 Mich. 460—Rookledge v. Garwood, 65 N.W. 2d 785, 340 Mich. 444.

(2) Amendment to workmen's compensation statute permitting injured employee to enforce compensation payments and also to sue third-party tort-feasor creates no new cause of action but merely limits the procedural defense of election of remedies, and, therefore, such amendment, even though enacted after negligence action against third-party tort-feasor was commenced but while such action was pending, governed the action.

U.S.—Foster v. Buckner, C.A.Mich., 203 F.2d 527, certiorari denied 74 S.Ct. 30, 346 U.S. 818, 98 L.Ed. 345.

Mich.—Munson v. Vane-Stecker Co., 79 N.W.2d 855, 347 Mich. 377.

(3) Where, under statute in force at time employee was injured, an employee's election to take compensation, his cause of action against third party became property of insurer, but by 1937 amendment the employee was not required to elect but might take compensation and also sue the third party, the amendment affected only matters of procedure and consequently was applicable to employee's previously existing cause of action against third party, and hence fact that employee accepted awards of workmen's compensation from insurer could not be asserted as a defense in employee's action against third party.

Curtis v. U. S. Trucking Corp., 2 N.Y.S.2d 248.

(4) The July 1, 1949, amendment to North Dakota workmen's compensation act providing that common-law liability of third party for injury or death of workman for which compensation has been claimed and paid is no longer to be enforced by workmen's compensation bureau but by workman or his dependents in his or their own right does not have a retroactive or retrospective effect and does not give workmen or their dependents accepting compensation prior to July 1 the right to maintain in their own names after July 1 actions against third party for personal injuries and wrongful death.

U.S.—Nelson v. Westland Oil Co., D. C.N.D., 96 F.Supp. 656.

N.D.—Gimble v. Montana-Dakota Utilities Co., 44 N.W.2d 198, 77 N. D. 581.

(5) Where workmen's compensation act prior to July 1, 1949, amendment provided that common-law liability of third party for injury or death of workman if compensation had been claimed and awarded could be enforced only by North Dakota workmen's compensation bureau for replenishment of compensation fund and for benefit and assistance of injured workmen, defendant whose negligence allegedly caused July 21, 1947, fire resulting in deaths and injuries for which workmen's compensation had been awarded did not prior to July 1, 1949, acquire vested payment of compensation, the view has been taken that an employee who has applied for and accepted compensation may not maintain an action for damages against a foreman in the same employ who caused the injury, where the injury was received while the employee and the foreman were acting in the regular course of their employment and was not caused willfully, wantonly, or maliciously.⁶⁵ Some acts which do not require an election give the employer or insurer rights against, or the right to reimbursement out of the amount recovered from, a third person, as discussed infra § 1041.

Option under act and common-law election compared and distinguished. The exercise of the option given by a compensation act to claim compensation under the act or to proceed at law against a third person has been distinguished from an election of remedies under doctrines of the common law⁶⁶ in that the option granted by the act provides for an election under statutory provisions which specify the conditions and terms of the election,⁶⁷ but the analogy is such that the rules of pleading and proof applicable to election of remedies under common-law doctrines apply to the exercise of the option under the act.⁶⁸

Right and obligation to elect in case of death by wrongful act. It is sometimes provided in express terms for an election by the dependents of a deceased employee between taking compensation and seeking damages from a third person,⁶⁹ and under the construction given other acts a provision for making an election or exercising an option applies in the case of an injury causing the death of an employee, although such provision in terms refers only to an injured employee.⁷⁰ A provision of the act which in terms makes the recovery of compensation exclusive even where the injury is caused by one not in the same employment has been construed in the light of another provision which recognizes the right of action against a third person not in the same employment so as to permit an election by the dependents of a deceased employee.⁷¹

Where the beneficiaries or dependents have accepted the benefits of the compensation act, an action against a third person may not be maintained by such beneficiaries or dependents where the provision for election includes such beneficiaries or dependents either expressly⁷² or by the construction given such provision.⁷³ Under some acts the right of election exists only when the injury resulting in death, caused by one not in the same employ, occurs away from the plant of the employer, as discussed infra § 988 e.

In the absence of any constitutional or statutory provision for an election the view has been taken that an election to take compensation or to bring an action for wrongful death is not required,⁷⁴ and the fact that the beneficiaries or dependents of a deceased employee have accepted compensation under the act does not prevent the maintenance of an action against a third person for causing the death of such employee.⁷⁵

Failure of employer to comply with act. Under some acts the duty to elect does not exist where the employer has failed to comply with the act.⁷⁶

Maritime tort. Attempted election to take compensation for the death of an employee which is the result of a maritime tort and not compensable under the state act under which the election was attempted does not, it has been held, prevent the personal representative of the deceased employee from bringing an action for damages for such death.⁷⁷

Claims against United States. The right of a person employed by the United States acting in one capacity, either to claim compensation under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act or to pursue a remedy for damages against the United States where the injury was sustained by an operation conducted by the United States in another capacity has been recognized,⁷⁸ but where such employee accepts compensation under the compensation act he may not pursue the remedy for damages.⁷⁹ Where compensation was accepted under the War Risk Insurance Act for an injury to, or the death of, a soldier or enlisted man of the United States Army, the personal representative of such soldier or enlisted man could not recover in an action for damages against the director general of railroads, based on the latter's alleged negligence in the operation of a railroad under federal control.⁸⁰

pensation under the act of a particular state, which does not require an election, does not prevent his maintaining an action against a third person in another state where the employee is not within the compensation act of such other state, even if the act of such other state prevents an employee who is subject to the act and who has accepted compensation from suing a third person;⁸¹ and the acceptance of compensation for the death of an employee, under the act of another state, does not, it has been held, bar an action by the personal representative for such death, at least where such act does not require an election.⁸² So a widow of an employee killed in one state as the result of negligence of a fellow employee is not precluded from suing the tort-feasor in such state by reason of a statute requiring an election between acceptance and retention of compensation benefits and suit against the fellow employee, by reason of her receipt of a compensation award under the statute of another state to which the employer and employee had agreed to be bound.⁸³

There is authority for the view that the acceptance of compensation for the death of an employee under the compensation act of one state which renders such acceptance an election may not prejudice the rights of defendant in an action by the personal representative in another state where the accident and death occurred,⁸⁴ but that if such acceptance inured to the advantage of defendant he may avail himself of such advantage.⁸⁵ Where, under the law of another state in which compensation was paid, a principal employer or general contractor, his subcontractor, and their respective insurers are equally responsible to an employee of the subcontractor for compensation for injuries, such employee is barred from any recovery in an action in another state predicated on common-law liability of the general contractor for negligence.⁸⁶

Effect on liability of third person and who benefited by provisions. Provisions for an election or for the exercise of an option, where the act also gives to the employer or insurer rights against the person liable for an injury to, or death of, an employee, are not, according to some cases, designed to benefit such person,⁸⁷ but are intended for the benefit of the employer,⁸⁸ or do not discharge the liability.⁸⁹

§ 988. Right or Duty to Elect under Particular Provisions

- a. In general
- b. Option to proceed for compensation or damages but not for both
- c. Provision forbidding collection, recovery, or receipt of both compensation and damages
- d. Acceptance of award or procurement of judgment barring alternate proceeding
- e. Limitation as to place of injury
- f. Limitation as to furtherance of common enterprise or accomplishment of same or related purposes

a. In General

A provision that the injured employee may at his option either claim compensation under the act or obtain damages from, or proceed at law against, the person liable for damages may deny to the injured employee the benefit of both remedies, but under some such provisions the fact that the injured employee has claimed and accepted compensation does not prevent an action by him against such third person.

According to some cases, a provision that the injured employee may at his option either claim compensation under the act or obtain damages from, or proceed at law against, the person liable other than the employer for damages provides for an election,⁹⁰ denies to the injured employee the benefit of both remedies,⁹¹ and prevents an action by him against the third person where the injured employee has elected to take compensation,⁹² at least where such action is for the sole benefit of the employee.⁹³ Such provision has been construed to apply where the claim is for the death of an employee notwithstanding such provision in terms refers only to an injured employee,⁹⁴ and when dependents have duly exercised the option to take compensation they cannot thereafter proceed against a third person.⁹⁵

In some jurisdictions, however, the view has been taken that, since such provision is not intended for the benefit of a third person who caused the injury,⁹⁶ the fact that the injured employee has claimed and accepted compensation does not prevent an action by him against such third person.⁹⁷ So under a provision of the act that the injured em-

Discontinuance of action

Massachusetts Workmen's Compensation Act provision that claimant, in electing to receive compensation benefits, must discontinue prior to trial any action at law for the compensable injury was not intended to aid third party in escaping liability for such injury but was inserted to preserve compensation carrier's right of action against third party. No waiver of right

A person having a cause of action against a third-party tort-feasor for damages for wrongful death or injury does not waive such right by exercising another right based on a claim for workman's compensation. Colo.—Drake v. Hodges, 161 P.2d 338, 114 Colo. 10.

The making of a compensation agreement whereby employee accepts a stated sum in payment of an injury sustained by accident arising out of, and in the course of, his employment, including permanent partial disability, does not bar the employee may claim compensation or bring an action against the person other than the employer, who is liable, construed in connection with a provision that if the employee elects to take compensation the employer or the compensation board will be subrogated to the rights of the employer, the view has been taken that an election to take compensation under the act does not necessarily prevent the employee from subsequently bringing an action against a third person⁹⁸ or prevent dependents from suing for damages against the third party whose negligence allegedly caused the death of the employee.⁹⁹

b. Option to Proceed for Compensation or Damages but Not for Both

Where the statute gives the option to an employee to proceed for compensation or for damages from a third person, but not for both, an election is provided for, and, if the person entitled to compensation duly elects to take compensation under the act, he may not also maintain an action against the third person who caused the injury, for the sole benefit of the employee.

Under an act giving the option to an employee either to claim compensation from insurer or employer or to seek damages from a third person, but providing that the employee or dependents may not proceed against both, it is usually held or recognized that an election is provided for,¹ and that, where the person entitled to compensation duly elects to take compensation under the act, he may not also maintain an action against the third person who caused the injury,² for the sole benefit of the employee.³

Such provision has so been construed as to apply to a claim for the death of the employee notwithstanding in terms it refers only to an injured employee⁴ and, as so construed, prevents an action by dependents or a personal representative who have duly elected or exercised the option to take compensation,⁵ for their own benefit.⁶ An employee who has made a binding and final election to accept workmen's compensation from his employer for his injuries may not maintain an action against a third-party tort-feasor on any theory that he was not entitled to compensation rights,⁷ and it is immaterial that the compensation proceedings are subsequently abandoned or prove unsuccessful.⁸

Under some statutes of this nature, however, the insurer may bring an action in the name of the em-recovery of damages for injuries sustained by reason of negligence of a third party, between whom and injured employee the relationship of employer and employee does not exist.

Intent

Statute requiring employee to exercise option between proceeding against third person to recover damages and proceeding against insurer for compensation, and providing that insurer may enforce third person's liability "if compensation be paid," manifested intent to compel employee or his administrator to make a final and binding election, and to preserve the cause of action at law for benefit of insurer if employee should choose compensation. employee or personal representative against the person liable for damages notwithstanding an election to take compensation, as discussed infra § 1017, and the person who has elected to take compensation may have a beneficial interest in the amount recovered, infra § 1040. So notwithstanding such a provision and a provision for subrogation of the insurer, in view of other provisions recognizing and preserving a substantial right of the employee for the recovery of damages even though he first proceeds for compensation under the act,⁹ the view has been taken that the injured employee may, after obtaining an award, and receiving payment, of compensation, bring an action against a third person,¹⁰ especially where the insurance carrier fails or refuses to bring the action, as discussed infra § 1004, or requests the employee to sue,¹¹ and a like rule applies in respect of an action for the death of an employee where such carrier fails or refuses to bring the action, as considered infra § 1004.

c. Provision Forbidding Collection, Recovery, or Receipt of Both Compensation and Damages

Where so provided by the statute, an injured employee may either claim compensation or proceed against a third person for damages, or may proceed against both but may not collect from both, and he must elect whether to collect compensation or damages.

Under some provisions, an injured employee may either claim compensation or proceed against a third person for damages, or may proceed against both but may not collect from both.¹² Under such a statute an employee,¹³ or, if the provision is applicable in case of death of the employee, his personal representative,¹⁴ who has not accepted compensation may bring an action against the third person for all damages caused by such person's wrongful act; and the employee may have his claim for compensation awarded and also prosecute his action for damages to judgment.¹⁵ The employee must, however, elect whether to collect compensation or damages,¹⁶ although a tort-feasor is not entitled to assert the receipt of workmen's compensation under the laws of another state as a defense to an action for damages brought by the injured employee.¹⁷

According to some cases an employee who has received compensation under the act loses his right to bring an action in his own behalf to recover damages from a third person,¹⁸ at least where the employee collects compensation without reserving his right of action for damages,¹⁹ and it has been held that an employee who accepts compensation under the act may not recover an additional amount in an action against a third person.²⁰ Under some acts of this general type, however, the acceptance of compensation does not necessarily bar an action against a third person.²¹ Thus in some jurisdictions

the provision that the employee shall not collect both from the employer and from the third person has been construed to mean that to the extent that the employee collects from one he may not collect from the other,²² and therefore that the collection of compensation does not bar an action to recover damages,²³ but the recovery of full damages by the employee is not allowed, as discussed infra § 1040.

Notwithstanding a provision of the general type here considered in terms refers only to an injured employee, it has been so construed as to apply where the claim is for the death of an employee,²⁴ and, as so construed, may prevent an action by a personal representative where compensation has been collected, at least where the action is brought under a statute which is primarily a survival statute.²⁵ Provisions of the general type here involved, considered in connection with provisions giving the employer the right to collect from a third person indemnity or compensation paid or payable, have been regarded as an integral part of the scheme for compensation,²⁶ and as intended for the benefit of the employer, and do not protect a negligent third person from liability for his negligent acts.²⁷

Under statutes which permit an action against a third person before an award is made but provide that the acceptance of an award or compensation under the act shall be a bar to proceeding further with the other remedy, the employee or his personal representative cannot recover both compensation and damages for his sole benefit.

Under an act permitting an action against a third person before an award is made and providing that the acceptance of an award or compensation under the act or the procurement of a judgment in the action shall be a bar to proceeding further with the alternate remedy, while, according to some cases, an injured employee may proceed concurrently against the employer and against a third person,²⁸ the employee or his personal representative cannot recover both compensation and damages for his sole benefit,²⁹ and an employee who accepts compensation under the act may not also recover in his own behalf damages from a third person,³⁰ but the acceptance of an award by the employee constitutes a bar to an action by him only to the extent that he cannot maintain the action in his own name and for his own benefit.³¹

e. Limitation as to Place of Injury

Under some statutes, presently or formerly in force, the right of an employee to elect to take compensation under the act or to seek a remedy against a third-party tort-feasor is limited to cases in which the injury occurs away from the plant of the employer, and where the injury does not occur away from the plant the person entitled to compensation is confined to seeking compensation.

Under some acts which have since been repealed in some jurisdictions, the right of an employee, or of dependents of a deceased employee, to elect to take compensation under the act or to seek a remedy against a third person who causes the injury is limited to cases in which the injury occurs away from the plant of the employer,³² and was due to the negligence or wrong of another not in the same employ;³³ and where the injury does not occur away from the plant the person entitled to compensation is confined to seeking compensation.³⁴ Where the injury occurs away from the plant and is due to the negligence of one not in the same employ, the person entitled to compensation may³⁵ and must³⁶

Other statement of rule

Legislative purpose of amendment to workmen's compensation act preventing injured employee from recovering both compensation under the act and damages from third-party tort-feasor, where the parties are engaged in a common enterprise or the same or related purposes in operation on premises where injury occurred, is to restore injured employee's common-law right of action against third-party tort-feasor, except where several employers are engaged on the same project and their employees are exposed to the same or similar hazards created by such mutual engagements.

Fair and liberal construction

(1) Amendment to workmen's compensation act permitting injured employee to recover from third-party tort-feasor subject to act unless employer and tort-feasor are engaged in a common enterprise or the same or related purposes in operation on premises where injury occurred was intended for the benefit of employees and should be liberally construed with such purpose and intent in mind.

Minn.—Swanson v. J. L. Shiely Co., 48 N.W.2d 848, 234 Minn. 548.

(2) Provision, being "remedial," should receive such fair and liberal construction as to make it a workable statute, thereby giving force and effect to legislative purpose.

Minn.—Gleason v. Geary, 8 N.W.2d 808, 214 Minn. 499.

Statutory conditions

(1) Section of workmen's compensation act depriving compensated employee of tort action against third party will prevent recovery only if: First, both injured worker's employer and third party were insured or self-insured under Workmen's Compensation Act; second, employer and third party were engaged in due course of business on same project; third, their employees were working together in performance of such project in manner which exposed them to same or similar hazards on premises where injury was received and at time thereof.

Minn.—Urbanski v. Merchants Motor Freight, 57 N.W.2d 686, 239 Minn. 68.

(2) Under compensation provision limiting an injured employee or his dependents to a choice between receiving "compensation" from employer or proceeding at law against third party causing injury, and provision that all employers shall be subject to provisions of workmen's compensation law, and every such employer shall be liable for compensation, word "compensation" refers to payment made by an employer subject to the Minnesota workmen's compensation act, and has no application to the United States or its agencies; so dependents of a deceased worker were not precluded by receipt of payment of compensation under the United States Compensation Act from bringing an action against the city whose negligence allegedly caused employee's death.

Minn.—Wagner v. City of Duluth, 300 N.W. 820, 211 Minn. 252.

Related businesses

Under Minnesota workmen's compensation act imposing liability on an employer other than an injured employee's employer, for the employee's injuries, where the injury complained of was received in the due course of business and in the accomplishment of the same or related purposes in operation on the premises where the injury was received, at the time thereof, businesses are "related" when the parties are mutually or reciprocally interested in a commercial way or where the business of one has a necessary relation toward or in conjunction with the other.

The supplying of a commodity or a service to a customer upon the latter's premises does not amount to engaging in the "same or a related purpose" by the parties within the meaning of provision of the workmen's compensation act preventing an injured employee from recovering both compensation under act and damages from third-party tort-feasor where the parties are engaged in the same or related purposes in operation on the premises where the injury was received.

ployee has been awarded, and is receiving from his employer, compensation does not prevent the maintenance of an action against the third person.⁴² Where, however, the employer, the employee, and the third person are subject to the compensation act and the employer and the third person are so engaged, an employee,⁴³ or dependents of a deceased employee,⁴⁴ who make a binding election to take compensation cannot maintain an action against the third person.

§ 989. Election by Particular Person in Case of Death by Wrongful Act

In the case of death of an employee by wrongful act of a third person, the widow of the deceased employee as administratrix is the proper person to elect between the compensation act and the seeking of recovery under a death act.

An election between the compensation act and the seeking of recovery under a death act is, under some acts, properly made by the widow of the deceased employee as administratrix.⁴⁵ Under a provision for election by the dependents of a deceased employee, the power of a widow to make an election so as to affect her own rights and those of a dependent child has been recognized⁴⁶ even though the widow has not been appointed administratrix,⁴⁷ and where she has duly made an election to take compensation she cannot thereafter as administratrix maintain an action against a third person under the death statute.⁴⁸

Even in the absence of a specific provision for an election in the case of the death of the employee, it has been held or recognized that the widow may elect to take compensation and thereby prevent the maintenance of an action for her own benefit,⁴⁹ or for the benefit of dependent children who are beneficiaries under the compensation act,⁵⁰ and even an action for the benefit of adult children who are not beneficiaries under the act.⁵¹ So, even where there is no provision for alternative remedies, the fact that a surviving widow on her own behalf and as guardian of a minor child accepts and retains compensation awarded in a proceeding under some compensation act prevents her as administratrix from maintaining an action against a third person.⁵²

The view has been taken, however, that the mother of a deceased employee does not, by accepting compensation, release the alleged wrongdoer from liability in an action for the benefit of the heirs and creditors of such employee,⁵³ that payment of compensation to a widow of the deceased workman does not preclude the bringing of a tort action against the tort-feasor by the children of the deceased,⁵⁴ and that the widow of a deceased em-

§ 990. What Constitutes and Validity

- a. In general
- b. Agreement with employer or insurer; settlement and release
- c. Prosecuting compensation proceeding
- d. Award of compensation
- e. Accepting or collecting payment or advances
- f. Furnishing or accepting hospital, medical, or nursing expenses
- g. Knowledge of alternative remedies; fraud or mistake
- h. Proceeding to impeach or avoid election

a. In General

In the absence of a statute or regulation defining what shall constitute an "election," any decisive act of a party with knowledge of his rights and of the facts indicating his intention to pursue one remedy rather than the other determines his election.

The view has been expressed that, in the absence of any statutory provision, or rule of the state industrial commission defining what shall constitute an "election," any decisive act of a party with knowledge of his rights and of the facts indicating his intention to pursue one remedy rather than the other determines his election.⁵⁷ So there is authority for the view that whether or not an employee has made an election to take compensation or to enforce a right against a third person is largely a matter of intention in each case,⁵⁸ and each case must be determined on its peculiar facts.⁵⁹

The act should so be construed as to give the employee a choice free from restraint,⁶⁰ and, until he has done something which evidences his intention to pursue one course or the other, the choice remains open to him.⁶¹ The right of election conferred by statute contemplates an opportunity for deliberation, followed by some affirmative action.⁶² These rules must, of course, be read in connection with the construction given the particular provision involved as to the right and duty to elect, discussed supra § 988, and as to the particular facts which constitute an election, infra subdivisions e-g of this section.

Under some statutes an election may or should be made by filing notice with the commission of intention to sue the third-party tort-feasor,⁶³ but notice to the commission constitutes a binding election only where no acceptance of compensation pursuant to an award has yet occurred;⁶⁴ and the filing of an election to receive compensation is not binding where, with the approval of the commission and prior to the time any compensation is received, the employee files another notice of election to sue negligent third parties.⁶⁵ Where no form of notice of election to recover damages against a third-party tort-feasor has been fixed by the statute or by administrative regulation, an alleged defective notice does not deprive the employee of the right to maintain an action against the third-party tort-feasor.⁶⁶

Definitive action

Under amended section of Delaware workmen's compensation act permitting an employee, injured by person other than employer, and who elects to receive compensation, to sue such third person within two hundred sixty days of date of accident, the election of remedies is not considered until there has been some definitive action as to compensation benefits, and where there had been no sufficient action under statutes to bring the amendment into play, the right of employee's widow under Delaware wrongful death act remained unimpaired.

Evidence; questions of law and fact. A third-party tort-feasor sued by an employee for negligence causing injury has the burden of proving plaintiff's election to take workmen's compensation, thus barring the action at law;⁶⁷ but an employee must sustain his claim of lack of knowledge to make a binding election by reasonable evidence.⁶⁸ Relevant evidence with respect to the issue of election is admissible.⁶⁹ Particular evidence has been held sufficient⁷⁰ or has been held insufficient⁷¹ to show an election to take compensation, precluding action at law. Ordinarily it is a question for the trial court in an action at law against a third-party tort-feasor to determine whether the employee instituting suit had made an election to receive compensation instead;⁷² but the determination whether the employee collected compensation has been held a question of fact for the jury.⁷³

b. Agreement with Employer or Insurer; Settlement and Release

A settlement of a claim for compensation and the acceptance of payments of compensation thereunder will evidence an election.

It has been laid down broadly that a settlement of a claim for compensation and the acceptance of payments of compensation thereunder will evidence an election.⁷⁴ So the view has been taken that an agreement for compensation between the employee and the employer's insurer, approved by the duly authorized board or department under provisions of the act, constitutes an election which will prevent the employee's maintaining an action for damages against a third person.⁷⁵ The making of an agreement for compensation by the administrator of a deceased employee with the employer, which is not approved by the industrial accident board, does not of itself, however, constitute such an election as will prevent an action against a third person.⁷⁶

Under some statutes the fact that the injured workman and his employer may have had agreements between themselves concerning compensation does not affect the liability imposed by law on a third-party tort-feasor as long as there has been no actual payment and satisfaction of the compensation claim,⁷⁷ and, if there was any mistake as to the terms of an agreement for compensation filed with the state industrial board and approved by the board, the workman and the employer are entitled to have the award of the board, based on such agreement, set aside, without affecting the right of the workman to proceed against the third-party tort-feasor.⁷⁸

c. Prosecuting Compensation Proceeding

Under some statutes the mere making of a claim for compensation is not decisive as an election of remedy, but it is the actual award which is binding, and until an award is made, the claimant may forego compensation under the act and pursue his remedy against a negligent third person.

Under some acts it is not the making of a claim

Repayment by employee

That employee and employer once had an agreement under which compensation was being paid to employee for injuries from negligence of third party did not relieve third party from liability where the agreement had been rescinded and the money repaid by employee, and neither employer nor his insurance carrier had a claim against third party.

for compensation under the act but the actual award which is decisive and binding,⁷⁹ and, even though an employee has made a claim, he may, until an award is made, forego compensation under the act and pursue his remedy against a negligent third person.⁸⁰ Furthermore, there must be a formal assertion of the claim⁸¹ and the mere appearance of the injured employee at a hearing before the industrial commission, pursuant to a direction of the commission, does not constitute a claim for compensation and an election where no claim was otherwise made,⁸² even though the commission gratuitously makes a temporary award which is not accepted or recognized by the employee.⁸³ Where, however, after making application for compensation, the injured employee is permitted to withdraw his claim in order to sue a third person, a subsequent application or request by the employee to the commission to assume jurisdiction and make an award may constitute an election to take compensation.⁸⁴

The mere signing of a claim for compensation does not necessarily constitute an election so as to prevent the maintenance of an action against a third person.⁸⁵ Where the person entitled to compensation merely gives to the employer and files with the designated commissioner the notice of injury and claim for compensation prescribed by other provisions of the act, in the absence of an award of compensation there is not such an exercise of the option to claim compensation by the person entitled to compensation as will, under some acts, preclude such person from maintaining an action against a third person.⁸⁶ An employee's initial pursuit of a statutory remedy of suit to set aside the ruling of the industrial board denying his claim for compensation for injuries sustained is not, strictly speaking, an election precluding subsequent action against negligent third parties for damages.⁸⁷

Option to proceed against either but not against both. Under an act giving the injured employee an option to proceed against the employer for compensation or to proceed against a third person for damages, but not against both, "to proceed" against the employer is to employ the procedure, the method, pointed out by the act.⁸⁸ According to some cases, bringing and prosecuting to a determination on the merits a proceeding for compensation con-

Withdrawal of claim

(1) Where employee filed and withdrew claim for workmen's compensation against employer, and no compensation was paid, agreed upon, or awarded, and no future claim could be filed because barred by one-year statute of limitations, employee did not elect to "claim compensation" so as to bar subsequent suit against alleged third-party tortfeasor for damages because of injuries.

Failure to attend hearing

Where guest, injured when automobile in which he was riding ran into tree, did not attend hearing of workmen's compensation board, although he received notice of hearing, the fact that guest received an award, which was not a final award, from workmen's compensation board for injuries suffered in accident did not bar guest's common-law action for damages against driver of automobile.

stitutes an election which will prevent the maintenance of an action by the employee against a third person,⁸⁹ even though there is a decision adverse to the employee⁹⁰ or the judgment for compensation against the employer is not collectible.⁹¹ It has been held, on the other hand, that where a compensation claim was filed before the industrial board but no proceedings were had on the claim and there had been no hearing or award, there was no election of alternative remedies preventing the valid institution of a suit by the injured employee against the third-party tort-feasor.⁹²

Ordinarily, where there is provision for an election and the employee's proceeding has progressed to an award, there is such an election as will prevent an action against a third person.

Under some acts it is not the making of a claim for compensation under the act but the actual award which is decisive and binding, as discussed supra subdivision c of this section, and, where no award has been made, a binding election precluding an action against a third person is not effected by the receipt of payments from the employer or the insurance carrier, infra subdivision e of this section. While ordinarily, where there is provision for an election and the employee's proceeding has progressed to an award, there is such an election as will prevent an action against a third person,⁹³ under some acts the view has been expressed that the mere filing of a claim for compensation followed by an award of full compensation under the act does not necessarily constitute an election.⁹⁴

Where the act permits an injured employee to recover damages from a third person before an award under the act is made and provides that the acceptance of an award shall be a bar to proceeding further with the alternate remedy, an agreement for compensation between the employee and the employer, duly filed with the industrial commission but not approved by it, is not an award so as to prevent an action against a third person.⁹⁵

e. Accepting or Collecting Payment or Advances

Ordinarily the receipt and acceptance of compensation constitutes such an election as will prevent an action by the injured employee against a third person, at least where full compensation has been received, or the acceptance of compensation is pursuant to an award.

Where the compensation act provides for an election, usually the receipt and acceptance of compensation constitutes such an election as will prevent an action by the injured employee against a third person,⁹⁶ at least where full compensation has been received,⁹⁷ or the acceptance of compensation is pursuant to an award.⁹⁸ There is authority for the view that there is an election to take compensation

Guardian

Where compensation claim was filed with state industrial commission by injured workman, who was thereafter adjudged incompetent, subsequent prosecution of claim by workman's guardian constituted sufficient "election" on part of incompetent to take compensation under the compensation act, rather than to pursue his remedy against third person whose negligence caused the injury.

Approval of admission of Liability
The action of an industrial commission statistician in approving insurance carrier's admission of liability did not constitute "awarding of compensation" effecting assignment of employee's cause of action to insurance carrier under compensation act, so as to bar employee's recovery from third person in tort action.

Colo.—King v. O. P. Baur Confectionery Co., 88 P.2d 909, 100 Colo. 528.

Assignment

Awarding of compensation to injured employee who elected to take compensation for injuries caused by third party operates as assignment of cause of action against third party to insurance carrier, notwithstanding employee did not execute instrument of assignment.

"Proceeding" against employer

Action of employee injured by third party, operating under workmen's compensation act, in seeking and accepting benefits prescribed in the act from employer, or his insurance carrier, is such a "proceeding" against the employer as to constitute a binding election which precludes the employee from maintaining action against the third party.

Strict construction

Provision of Longshoremen's Compensation Act that acceptance of compensation under an award in a compensation order filed by deputy commissioner should operate as an assignment to employer of all rights against third persons should be strictly construed against the employer.

U.S.—Sessa v. Weeks Stevedoring Co., D.C.N.Y., 56 F.Supp. 50.

Purpose

The provision of the Longshoremen's Compensation Act transferring to the employer the right of its injured employee against a third-party tort-feasor upon the employee's acceptance of compensation under the act is designed for the protection of the employer and not the third-party wrongdoer except to the extent that the latter is thereby protected against suit by both the employee and his employer.

U.S.—The Owen, D.C.Pa., 43 F.Supp. 897.

Complete defense

Where the employer of an injured employee, who has accepted compensation under the Longshoremen's Compensation Act, objects to action by employee against third-party tort-feasor, or does not affirmatively assent thereto on the record, the third party may assert as a complete defense to action by employee the transfer of employee's claim to the employer by operation of provisions of act.

U.S.—The Owen, supra.

Payment held not voluntary

Where award under Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act was in amount of five hundred sixty-five dollars subject to liens of eighty-five dollars and employee received five hundred twelve dollars from insurance carrier, the variation in amount did not render the payment "voluntary" so as to preclude assignment of employee's cause of action to the state insurance fund and hence employee's action was required to be dismissed.

U.S.—Sabol v. Merritt Chapman &

Scott Corp., D.C.N.Y., 137 F.Supp. 635, affirmed, C.A., 241 F.2d 765.

A master's report that deputy commissioner noted in his records disposition he had made of injured longshoreman's claim for compensation was equivalent to an "order" and satisfied Longshoremen's Compensation Act amendment providing that acceptance of compensation under an award in a compensation order filed by deputy commissioner shall operate as an assignment to employer of all right of person entitled to compensation to recover damages against a third person, precluding longshoreman from suing third parties for his injuries.

U.S.—Toomey v. Waterman S. S. Corp., C.C.A.N.Y., 123 F.2d 718.

Partial satisfaction of award

Where there was disagreement as to whether compensation was payable under federal or state law, and insurer liable under federal law commenced action to have award under that law set aside, but, pending disposition thereof, entered into agreement with insurer liable under state law whereby federal law insurer paid to workman the lesser sum to which he would be entitled if state law were applicable, such payment would have to be held to have been made in partial satisfaction of award under federal law, and to have resulted in statutory assignment of workman's right to recover from alleged third-party tort-feasors precluding action by employee against third party.

(2) Under the Longshoremen's Compensation Act, as amended in 1938, there must be some official action by the deputy commissioner establishing an award of compensation in order to make a longshoreman's acceptance of compensation an assignment of the employee's cause of action against a third party although the award may be informal.

act, an injured employee has filed the required notice of an election to proceed against a person other than the employer it has been held that the acceptance of advances made under an agreement between the employee and insurer does not defeat his right to recover in the proceedings against the person other than the employer.²

Where under the act the employee may proceed against the employer for compensation or against a third person for damages but not against both, in the absence of any agreement between the person entitled to compensation and the employer approved by the designated board as required by the act or of a submission of a demand against the employer to lawful determination, the mere receipt of payments from the employer made in view of the admitted right to claim compensation,³ or the acceptance of a pension which under the act could be taken in lieu of compensation,⁴ does not necessarily constitute an election which will prevent the bringing of an action against a person other than the employer. Under a similar statute, however, the view has been taken that an employee who, after commencing an action against a third person, accepts compensation from his employer thereby abandons his action against such third person and waives his rights thereunder,⁵ and the settlement of a claim for compensation and the acceptance of payments of compensation thereunder will evidence an election, as discussed supra subdivision b of this section.

Advances or payments received from the employer under an agreement or understanding that repayment will be made⁶ in the event of a recovery from the third person⁷ may not constitute an election which will defeat the employee's action against the third person.

Provision denying right to collect both compensation and damages. As used in a provision giving an injured employee an option to proceed either for compensation or for damages or against both the employer and a person other than the employer, but denying the right to "collect" from both, the word "collect" implies the act of payment and collection of money and imports an act of payment without reference to the legal grounds on which payment may be demanded.⁸ Where the employee receives money or the equivalent from his employer, he cannot maintain an action against a third person primarily responsible for the injury.⁹

The employee does not, however, lose his right to sue a third person until the employee collects compensation from his employer,¹⁰ and the fact that the Agreement without payment

Under provision of compensation act pertaining to liability of third-party tort-feasor, employee and his employer may enter into agreement concerning compensation and have same approved by industrial board without affecting employee's right to sue for and collect damages from the third-party wrongdoer, and mere fact of agreement does not indicate an election by employee of his remedy and does not affect liability of third-party wrongdoer, as long as there has been no actual payment and satisfaction of claim.

Ind.—Armstrong Cork Co. v. Maar, 111 N.E.2d 82, 124 Ind.App. 105, rehearing denied 112 N.E.2d 240, 124 Ind.App. 105.

employer files a petition to have the compensation fixed and has the amount fixed, as permitted by the act, does not of itself affect the right of the employee to proceed against the third person.¹¹ So the right of the employee to recover from a third person has been recognized where the payments by the employer are received as a gift¹² or loan.¹³ Under some provisions eliminating the necessity for an injured employee to make an election as to whether to pursue a third party or take under the compensation act, no such separate action may be maintained against an employee of the employer if the benefits of compensation are retained.¹⁴

Partial compensation. Under some acts the receipt of partial compensation does not necessarily constitute an election preventing a subsequent action against a third person,¹⁵ at least where payments made have been repaid and the industrial accident commission disclaims any interest in the employee's claim.¹⁶ The view has been taken that the mere receipt of payments from the industrial accident commission to cover temporary loss of time and wages only does not constitute an election to take compensation.¹⁷

f. Furnishing or Accepting Hospital, Medical, or Nursing Expenses

An election to take compensation, precluding a common-law action against the third person responsible for an employee's injuries, is not established by the mere acceptance by the employee of medical, surgical, or hospital aid furnished by the employer or insurer.

The mere acceptance of medical, surgical, or hospital aid by the employee may not constitute an election to take compensation, precluding a common-law action against the tort-feasor responsible for the employee's injuries,¹⁸ at least where there has been no claim¹⁹ or proceeding²⁰ for compensation under the act, or where the employee is not entitled to compensation.²¹

g. Knowledge of Alternative Remedies; Fraud or Mistake

Generally an election as between workmen's compensation and the remedy against a third-party tort-feasor must be made with knowledge of the alternative remedies and that the acceptance of one waives the right to the other; and an election to take compensation may be impeached for fraud or for want of knowledge of facts showing the liability of a third person.

It is generally held that an election as between workmen's compensation and the remedy against a third-party tort-feasor must be made with knowledge

No "award of compensation"

Employee who had accepted hospitalization, medical services, and wages under benefit plan which court assumed constituted self-insurance under the workmen's compensation act was not thereby deprived of right to sue third-party tort-feasor, notwithstanding provision in statute that awarding of compensation shall operate as an assignment of cause of action to industrial commission, since acceptance of benefits does not constitute an "award of compensation."

Lien of carrier

That insurance carrier had paid medical expenses of injured employee was not a sufficient defense in employee's action against third-party tort-feasor where carrier had elected to claim a lien on any recovery to be had by employee in such action.

of the alternative remedies and that the acceptance of one waives the right to the other;²² and a purported election of remedies is not binding if made without such knowledge, whether the ignorance be with respect to the law or with respect to the facts.²³ An election will not be presumed if the employee has acted in ignorance of his right and obligation to make an election, where no other person's rights have been prejudicially affected,²⁴ and there is authority for the view that there is no binding election which will prevent an action against a third person where the injured employee, in proceeding under the act and accepting compensation, does not understand the nature and effect of his acts²⁵ or has no knowledge of his legal rights,²⁶ including his right to make an election.²⁷ So the mere receipt of moneys from the compensation board or commission does not necessarily constitute such an election to take compensation as will prevent an action against a third person where the moneys were received when the employee had no knowledge of his right to a remedy against the third person.²⁸

While it has apparently been recognized that an election to take compensation may be impeached for fraud²⁹ or for want of knowledge of facts showing the liability of a third person,³⁰ according to some cases, want of knowledge of the compensation act,³¹ of a provision of the act permitting the employee to proceed against a third person,³² or want of knowledge of the fact that the act requires an election,³³ is not ground for impeaching, or avoiding the effect of, such election.

h. Proceeding to Impeach or Avoid Election

An election once made may not be avoided in a collateral proceeding, but it is necessary to attack it by a direct proceeding in equity, in which proceeding all persons interested should be made parties.

According to some cases an election once made may not be avoided in a collateral proceeding.³⁴ This rule has been applied where, after an election to take compensation, the employee seeks to impeach such election in an action against a third person alleged to be liable for the injury for which compensation has been sought,³⁵ as, for example, for fraud³⁶ or insanity;³⁷ in order to impeach such election it is permissible³⁸ and necessary³⁹ to attack

Acceptance of compensation

An employee who was allegedly injured because of the negligence of a third person was not entitled to recover damages from the third person after the injured employee had accepted compensation from his employer under the compensation act, notwithstanding injured employee contended at time he accepted the compensation that he was not aware of any choice of remedy that he might have had and that he did not intend to abandon his rights against the third person.

it by a direct proceeding in equity, in which proceeding all persons interested should be made parties so that they will be bound by the decree.⁴⁰ In such proceeding the injured employee has the burden of establishing the fact on which his claim to impeach the election is based.⁴¹

Where an employee had allegedly rescinded his election to accept compensation under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act by advising his employer of the rescission and offering to return benefits received, he was not required to go into equity to rescind his election before proceeding against the third-party tort-feasor for damages, since one having a right to rescind need not turn to the courts to have the rescission accomplished where it has already been accomplished by rescission in pais.⁴²

§ 991. Effect of Failure to Make Election; Election or Consent as Condition Precedent

Notwithstanding a provision of the act requiring evidence or filing of election to bring an action against a third person, the filing with the designated commission of the prescribed notice of election is not a condition precedent to the right of the employee to bring the action.

Since a provision of the act requiring evidence or filing of election to bring an action against a third person is regarded as one for the benefit of the person liable to pay compensation under the act,⁴³

or for the benefit and guidance of the employer and employee,⁴⁴ the filing with the designated commission of the prescribed notice of election to bring an action for damages is not a condition precedent to the right of the employee to bring the action;⁴⁵ nor is the consent of the commission a condition precedent to an action by the personal representative for the death of an employee.⁴⁶ Therefore, where the injured workman is required by the compensation act to elect whether to take compensation under the act or to pursue his remedy against a third person occasioning his injury, his failure formally to elect is not a defense to his action against the third person;⁴⁷ nor will the failure of the widow of a deceased employee, in this respect, prevent her maintenance of an action against a third person for the death of such employee.⁴⁸

Election in advance of suit. Where the act provides that the injured workman shall elect whether to take under the act or to seek a remedy against a person not in the same employ whose negligence was the cause of the injury and that such election shall be in advance of suit, the provision for election in advance of suit is for the benefit of the state in the administration of the accident fund,⁴⁹ and not for the benefit of the third person,⁵⁰ and the view has been taken that such third person cannot, in an action against him, successfully complain of the injured employee's failure to make an election in advance of suit.⁵¹

c. Right of Employer or Insurer to Remedy of Employee or to Reimbursement or Indemnity; Subrogation

§ 992. In General

- a. General rules
- b. Abatement and survival
- c. Necessity for, and limitation of rights by, statutory or contractual provision

a. General Rules

Under various statutory provisions, the rights of an employee receiving compensation for injuries, against a third person who caused them, are assigned to the employer, or the employer is subrogated thereto, or may seek reimbursement from the wrongdoer.

By the terms of some acts, an assignment, to the employer or person liable to pay compensation, of the employee's right of action against the person causing the injury is effected by the making of a claim for compensation,⁵² an election to take compensation,⁵³ the award of compensation to the employee,⁵⁴ the payment of a compensation award,⁵⁵ the acceptance of an award of compensation,⁵⁶ or the failure of the employee to prosecute his own right of action within a specified time.⁵⁷

It may be provided that the employer who has paid compensation or has become liable therefor may recover from the person liable,⁵⁸ and that, if com-

Statute not one of limitations

(1) Provision requiring workman taking compensation to bring action against third-party tort-feasor within specified time and transferring such cause of action to employer after lapse of such time, does not merely bar remedy and does more than create a statute of limitations.

(2) Intent of provision that if employee did not commence third-party action within specified time, cause of action is assigned by operation of law to his employer, was not to establish statute of limitations diminishing normal period for institution of employee's personal injury action, but rather to effectuate automatic assignment for protection of employer. pensation is paid under the act, an employer may enforce for his own benefit, or for that of insurer, and that of the employee, the liability of a person other than the employer.⁵⁹ Other acts make specific provision that the employer shall be subrogated to the right of the employee against a third person.⁶⁰ Provision is sometimes made that the employer shall be repaid compensation paid to the employee from any judgment or settlement, in excess of the amount of compensation, which is secured against a third person.⁶¹

Some acts provide for a lien against any judgment of the employee against a person other than the employer for the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation.⁶²

visions of a compensation statute relating to subrogation, statutory definitions of terms used in the statute must be considered.⁶³ Some provisions for the transfer of a cause of action to an employer have been held to be remedial in nature;⁶⁴ these provisions should be liberally construed to effectuate their purposes.⁶⁵ However, the provisions relating to an assignment of the employee's right of action on the giving of notice by the employee to the employer of his acceptance of the compensation, being in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed.⁶⁶

Who is "employer." The word "employer" as used in the statute subrogating the person paying compensation to the rights of the employee against another who is legally liable for damages means either the immediate employer⁶⁷ or one of a succession of employers engaged in an original undertaking, or some part thereof,⁶⁸ who has paid compensation for injuries to, or death of, the employee. A person who conducts his work through a superintendent of construction may be regarded as an "employer" entitled to subrogation under a provision therefor, notwithstanding another provision of the act which, under certain circumstances, relieves the person who contracts with such contractor from liability for compensation to employees of an independent contractor.⁶⁹ A property owner who has paid for injuries sustained by an employee of an uninsured independent contractor working on his property is an employer entitled to recoup the money so paid.⁷⁰

Where a person serving in the national guard is not an employee of the state within the compensation act, as considered supra § 116, the state, although paying an award under the state military code for such person's injuries, is not entitled to be subrogated to his rights against a third-person tortfeasor.⁷¹

Employee. A person who is a noncommissioned officer in the regular army of the United States is not a federal employee within a statutory provision for subrogation of the United States to an employee's right of action against a third person for personal injuries.⁷²

b. Abatement and Survival

Under statutory provisions, the right of action of an employer against a third-party wrongdoer has been held not abated by the death of the employee or employer. Whether the right abates on the death of the wrongdoer depends on the provisions of the governing statute.

A provision of a section of the compensation act that the death of the employee or any other person shall not abate any right of action established by the section has been construed as applicable to the right of action of the employer or insurer against the third-person wrongdoer.⁷³ Even in the absence of a statute relating to abatement, a cause of action for personal injuries, begun by the employer before the death of the employee from other causes, does not abate by reason of such death before trial.⁷⁴ So, an action brought by insurer for pain and suffering and other damages sustained by an employee up to the time of his death is not abated, but is preserved by statute.⁷⁵ Where the act provides that the making of a claim for, or the awarding of, compensation shall operate as an assignment, the right of action of the employer or insurer acquired under such provision is not defeated by the death of the employer,⁷⁶ or, where the action is for the death of the employee, by the death of the widow of such employee.⁷⁷

The right of an employer to sue the administrator of a deceased tort-feasor's estate to recover compensation paid has been sustained under a probate statute authorizing such action against an administrator when deceased has injured the property of plaintiff.⁷⁸ However, the right of an employer to maintain an action under the subrogation provision of the act, against the personal representative of the wrongdoer for the amount of compensation paid,⁷⁹ or for damages arising out of injuries to the employer's personal estate by reason of the employee's death,⁸⁰ has been denied; and a right of action under a subrogation provision has been denied to an insurer, where, although the wrongful act occurred before the death of the wrongdoer, the injury to the employee occurred after it.⁸¹

c. Necessity for, and Limitation of Rights by, Statutory or Contractual Provision

Under most authorities, the right of an employee to recover against a wrongdoer for injury to an employee depends on statutory authority.

The rights of an employer who has paid, or has become liable to pay, compensation against a person other than the employer are usually statutory.⁸²

However, the view has been expressed that a provision for subrogation of an employer, who pays compensation to an employee for injuries received in his employment, is merely declaratory of the common-rule of subrogation⁸³ and is available to the employer without an act of the legislature.⁸⁴

In the absence of a statutory provision for an assignment of the employee's rights,⁸⁵ or a provision that an employer shall be subrogated to the right of the employee or the dependents against a third person and may recover any amount which such employee or his dependents would have been entitled to recover,⁸⁶ the employer does not have the rights sometimes provided by statutory provisions. The right of an employer to be indemnified by,⁸⁷ or to seek reimbursement from,⁸⁸ a third person for an amount paid to an employee as compensation has been denied in the absence of any statutory provision therefor.

Where the act permits the employer to enforce the liability of a person other than the employer for himself or for the insurance carrier if compensation is claimed and awarded or paid, the remedy so provided is exclusive,⁸⁹ and the employer's rights and remedies are not subject to exceptions not contained in the compensation act.⁹⁰

It has also been held that workmen's compensation is not subject to the principle of subrogation in the absence of a statute or specific contractual provision.⁹¹

Although it has been held that an employer may not bring an action against a tort-feasor except as authorized by the act,⁹² the right to bring the action has been upheld even though the employer failed to file the required reports with the compensation board.⁹³

Nature of subrogation right

Provisions of Kentucky act became part of contract of employment entered into in Kentucky, so that insurer's right of subrogation was not only statutory but contractual.

U.S.—Sloan v. Appalachian Electric Power Co., D.C.W.Va., 27 F.Supp. 108, applying Kentucky law.

Effect of statutory amendment

Effect of agreement

Where compensation insurer, although not itself actual party to workman's suit against third-party tort-feasor, entered into written contract with workman to effectuate purpose of subrogation provision of act, insurer became subrogee to extent of compensation paid by it, not only under express terms of act, but under written agreement.

In New Jersey

(1) Employer's insurer is entitled to reimbursement out of damages recovered by injured employee from tort-feasor for compensation paid to employee.

N.J.—Scheno Trucking Co. v. Bickford, 174 A. 548, 116 N.J.Eq. 586.

(2) Insurance carrier's right of subrogation for injuries to employee by third party is restricted to method of reimbursement provided for by statute through right of injured employee or his dependents against third party in tort, and insurer has no direct cause of action against

Some provisions which give to an employer who has paid, or who has become liable for, compensation, rights against the person causing the injury, have been construed in connection with another provision that "employer," as used in the act, includes "insurer,"⁹⁸ or with another provision for the subrogation of insurer to the rights of the employer,⁹⁹ so as to permit an insurer to assert rights against the person causing the injury.

Construction of statute. The compensation statute giving a compensation insurer the right to enforce the legal liability of a third-person tort-feasor should be liberally construed to accomplish the purposes for which it was enacted.¹

Exoneration or indemnity. Where an immediate employer's liability to its employee for his injuries

is primary, and the liability of the principal employer is merely secondary, a compensation insurer of the immediate employer is not entitled to any relief against the principal employer on the basis of exoneration or indemnity.²

Action by insurer against employee. Where an employee who has accepted a compensation settlement from his employer's insurer obtains a larger recovery from the third-person tort-feasor, insurer, although it had not intervened in the employee's action against the tort-feasor, can recover the sum received by the employee as compensation.³ The right of action of insurer against the employee does not arise out of subrogation,⁴ but is based on a claim for money had and received by the employee for the use of insurer.⁵

b. Necessity for, and Limitation of Rights by, Statutory Provision

Authorities differ as to whether the right of an insurer to recover against a wrongdoer depends on statutory authority.

According to some cases, insurer is subrogated to the rights of the employer to the extent that it has discharged its duties, independently of any statutory provision therefor,⁶ on the theory that subrogation is a normal incident of indemnity insurance,⁷ or by reason of a conventional subrogation;⁸ and, where it has obtained an assignment from the employer, insurer may sue the wrongdoer even though in the absence of such assignment it could not sue.⁹

According to other cases, however, the rights against the third-person wrongdoer of an insurance carrier who has paid, or has become liable to pay, compensation are wholly the creature of statute¹⁰ and cannot exist independently thereof;¹¹ and, when the applicable provision is in terms confined to the employer, an insurer who pays compensation is not entitled to bring an action against the person causing the injury.¹²

by statute, insurer's rights are limited to those given thereby;¹³ and when insurer seeks or accepts the benefits of subrogation as provided by the statute, it must also accept the rules, regulations, burdens, and conditions which go with the statutory right of subrogation.¹⁴

§ 994. Nature and Purpose of Particular Statutory Provision

- a. Provision for subrogation
- b. Provision for assignment
- c. Miscellaneous provisions

a. Provision for Subrogation

The nature and purpose of the subrogation provisions giving a right of action against tort-feasors to employers or their insurers have been variously stated. Such provisions are for the benefit of injured employees and their subrogees, and not for the benefit of the tort-feasor.

The primary purpose of provisions of the compensation statutes by which an employer is subrogated to the rights of the injured employee against a third-party tort-feasor is to give the employer, who has paid compensation, a means of recouping his loss,¹⁵

and the safeguarding of the employee's hope of further recovery is of secondary interest.¹⁶ The purpose of a provision for the subrogation of a state insurance fund to the rights of the employee is to make the wrongdoer who caused the injury contribute to the payment of compensation to the employee whenever possible.¹⁷

In providing that an employer shall be "subrogated" to the right of the employee or the dependents of a deceased employee against a third person, it is presumed that the legislature used the word "subrogation" in its legal sense,¹⁸ that a statutory subrogation has the same characteristics that it would have if it were a creature of equity,¹⁹ that it is enforced solely for the purpose of accomplishing the ends of substantial justice,²⁰ that it does not depend on any contractual relation between the parties,²¹ and that the subrogation provided for is not an assignment.²²

The subrogation intended by such a provision has, however, been regarded as a conventional, as distinguished from a legal, subrogation,²³ and it has even been stated that under an act containing such provision the employer takes over the employee's cause of action by statutory assignment rather than by strict subrogation.²⁴ In other cases, while a dis-

inction between an assignment and subrogation has been recognized,²⁵ the view has been taken that "subrogation," within the meaning of such provision, means "substitution,"²⁶ and that the ultimate effect of subrogation under such provision and of an assignment would be much the same in substituting one person to another's rights.²⁷

The word "subrogated," as used in a provision that, where compensation is payable, the right of the employee or personal representative against a person other than the employer shall be "subrogated" to the employer, means "transferred,"²⁸ and by the operation of the act the right of action against the third person is transferred to the employer, as considered infra § 1002.

Under a provision that, if compensation is claimed and awarded under the act, an employer having paid the compensation on having become liable therefor shall be subrogated to the rights of the employee to recover against a person other than the employer, subrogation relates back to the time the injury was inflicted;²⁹ and, where compensation has been paid under the act, the claim against the third person is that of the employer or his insurer,³⁰ and the employer or insurer has the management of an action on the claim,³¹ and may dismiss the action or discharge the claim, as considered infra § 1005.

Persons protected. A provision for subrogation to the rights of an injured employee against a third person may be for the benefit of the employer,³² the employee and the employer,³³ the employer and insurer,³⁴ insurer and the employee,³⁵ or the employer, insurer, employee, and the employee's dependents.³⁶ Such provision is not intended for the benefit of the negligent third person³⁷ and does not relieve him from liability.³⁸

It is of no concern of the tort-feasor by whom recovery is had;³⁹ he is concerned only as to whom the amount of recovery is to be paid,⁴⁰ and to be protected against a double suit⁴¹ and double recovery.⁴² Likewise, he is entitled to be protected against double liability.⁴³

Prevention of double recovery. One purpose of a provision for the subrogation of the employer is to prevent a double recovery by the employee.⁴⁴

Splitting causes of action. The view has been expressed that a provision for subrogation does not involve a splitting of causes of action.⁴⁵

b. Provision for Assignment

The nature and purpose of a statutory provision for the assignment of an injured employee's rights against a tort-feasor to the person liable for the payment of compensation have been variously stated. The provision is not for the tort-feasor's benefit.

The purposes of a provision of a compensation act that an award shall operate as an assignment of an employee's right of action against a third-party tort-feasor to the person liable for compensation are to permit the latter to enforce the third person's liability,⁴⁶ and to reimburse himself.⁴⁷

The view has been expressed that the effect of an award of compensation is to subrogate insurer to the cause of action, if any, in favor of the employee against a third person under such a provision;⁴⁸

Integral element of theory of compensation

Employer's right of subrogation to rights of person entitled to compensation under longshoremen's and harbor workers' compensation act as against third-party tort-feasor is integral element of theory under which compensation is awarded in first instance.

U.S.—Culley v. Willard, D.C.N.Y., 146 F.Supp. 421.

Outright assignment not made

Workmen's "assignment" to insurer of cause of action against another for damages does not work outright assignment of such cause but under a provision that the acceptance of an award of compensation shall operate as an assignment of the right of the employee to receive damages, the right of the employer⁴⁹ or insurance carrier⁵⁰ does not, it has been said, rest on the principle of subrogation.

Where an assignment to the employer, pursuant to the act, has once become effective, title to the cause of action so vested may not be divested, without the employer's consent, either by the employee⁵¹ or by the industrial commission.⁵² Where, under a provision for assignment, the employer or insurer has acquired the right to proceed against the third-person wrongdoer, an action against such third person is prosecuted, not in behalf of the employee, or, in case of his death, of the persons designated as the beneficiaries in the statute providing for an action for wrongful death,⁵³ but in behalf of the employer or insurer.⁵⁴ The statutory assignment of a cause of action against a third-party wrongdoer carries with it the right to conduct litigation.⁵⁵

The ownership of a cause of action by an insurer who has paid compensation, under a statute of the type here considered, is by statutory assignment,⁵⁶ and not as a lienor.⁵⁷

Person protected or affected. A provision for the assignment of the employee's right of action applies only to the employee, employer, and insurance carrier;⁵⁸ it is intended for the protection of insurer,⁵⁹ the employee,⁶⁰ and the employer.⁶¹ Such provision is not designed to benefit the third-party tortfeasor,⁶² to affect his liability,⁶³ or to relieve him from liability.⁶⁴

Splitting causes of action. A provision for the assignment of a cause of action to the employer does not purport to split the cause of action.⁶⁵ Since an employee who is injured as the result of the activity of joint wrongdoers can sue them separately or jointly for all of his injuries, an assignment, to the compensation fund, of his remedy against one wrongdoer is not a prohibited splitting of a cause of action.⁶⁶

Where the widow of a deceased employee and her minor children were awarded compensation for his death, and assigned their rights against the tortfeasor to the state, the assignment is not invalidated on the theory of the splitting of the widow's sole cause of action brought by her as administratrix against the tortfeasor for the benefit of an adult child, under statutes other than the compensation act, since the widow or administratrix possesses distinct causes of action, one for tort damages held by the adult child and one for compensation of the widow and minor children.⁶⁷

c. Miscellaneous Provisions

The nature and purpose of various other provisions entitling one who has paid compensation to an injured employee to succeed to his rights against the wrongdoer have been variously stated.

The right of an employer who has paid, or has of action, but amounts to no more than right of "subrogation" to extent of compensation paid by employer and insurer.

become liable to pay, compensation, under a provision expressly permitting him to bring an action for damages against a third person is based on the principle of subrogation;⁶⁸ but the right of an employer under a provision expressly permitting him to collect indemnity from a third person is not based on that principle.⁶⁹ Under both such provisions, the cause of action is in effect assigned to the employer.⁷⁰

Under a provision that, if compensation is paid, insurer may enforce for its own benefit the liability of a person other than the employer, the right of an insurer does not rest or depend on the principle of subrogation⁷¹ or on the theory of reimbursement;⁷² such act makes a transfer to insurer of the employee's right to enforce the legal liability of the third person, and thereafter insurer becomes, in substance, an assignee of the employee's cause of action.⁷³

The view has been expressed that, under a provision that if compensation is paid the employer may enforce the liability of a person other than the employer, there is effected a transfer or assignment of the employee's right of action, that is to say, a subrogation.⁷⁴ A provision that the court shall, on application, allow, as a first lien against any judgment of the employee against a person other than the employer, the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation is not self-executing in the employer's interest.⁷⁵

Prevention of double recovery. The purpose of provisions of the compensation act which permit the employer to bring an action against the person liable for an injury to the employee⁷⁶ or to impress on a judgment against such person recovered by the employee, a lien for the employer's expenditures for compensation,⁷⁷ is to prevent the employee from obtaining double payment or recovery for the same compensable injury.

Contribution act. It has been held that it is not the intention of the statute relating to contribution between joint tort-feasors to obligate a tort-feasor, in consequence of his concurrent negligence with that of the employer, to pay his pro rata share of an employee's compensation award, in view of the fact that there was no joint or several liability, in tort, of the employer and the tort-feasor to the employee, and no equivalence of monetary responsibility of each to be divided into pro rata shares.⁷⁸

Under most statutory provisions authorizing the employer or insurer to succeed to an employee's rights against a tort-feasor, no new or independent cause of action is created.

Most statutory provisions transferring an employee's right of action against a tort-feasor to an employer or insurer do not extinguish a cause of action against a person other than the employer⁷⁹ and do not impose a new liability on the tort-feasor.⁸⁰ These provisions do not create a new cause of action⁸¹ or one which is additional,⁸² independent, or severable.⁸³ The statutory provisions keep the cause of action alive for the benefit of the employer⁸⁴ or insurer,⁸⁵ and the right of recovery is transferred.⁸⁶

The cause of action of an employer has been held to be derivative.⁸⁷ Notwithstanding this fact, the right given to the employer is his right, and not that of the employee or personal representative.⁸⁸

So, also, a provision that, if compensation is claimed and awarded or paid under the act, the employer or insurance carrier may enforce for his benefit the liability of a person other than the employer does not take away common-law rights from anyone,⁸⁹ but declares how the right shall be regu-

§ 996. What Causes of Actions or Claims Transferred, Enforceable, or Subject of Indemnification; Transfer of Entire Cause of Action

- a. In general
- b. Cause of action based on death of employee

a. In General

Any cause of action of an employee for a compensable injury is transferred or assigned to an employer paying compensation. Whether the transfer or assignment is entire or partial depends on the provisions of the governing statute.

In general, any cause of action of the employee against a person other than the employer in favor of an employee for an injury caused by such other is the subject of subrogation,⁹³ or is transferred or assigned to the employer,⁹⁴ under provisions of the compensation acts transferring the employee's rights to him where the injury is compensable. It has been held that the subrogation of the employer⁹⁵ or insurer⁹⁶ is to the right of the injured employee or his dependents to bring an action for damages against the person causing the injury by negligence or wrongful act, and that an employer and his compensation insurer are subrogated only to tort claims existing in favor of the employee or his dependents,⁹⁷ and not to contract claims existing in their favor.⁹⁸

The view has been taken that the injury on which the cause of action against the third person is based must be such as will support a claim for compensation,⁹⁹ but insurer has been permitted to sue under a provision that awarding compensation shall operate as an assignment where the injury was the result of a maritime tort.¹

Rights acquired under a foreign compensation act by statutory assignment may be enforced by an employer in the state of the forum.²

Cause of action based on contract between employer and third person. There is authority for the view that, under a provision that the award of compensation shall operate as an assignment to the person liable for compensation of the cause of action against a person not in the same employ, there is no subrogation of an insurer who has paid compensation to the employer's right of action against a negligent third person based on a contract between such third person and the employer.³

Entire or partial assignment or transfer. Under an act providing for the assignment to the person liable to pay compensation of a cause of action against a third person, it has been held or recognized that the entire cause of action is transferred.⁴ Under a provision that the receipt of compensation shall operate as an assignment to the employer or insurer to the extent of the liability of the employer to the employee, occasioned by the injury, there is only a partial assignment;⁵ likewise, a provision for subrogation does not effect a transfer to the employer of the entire cause of action of the employee;⁶ and, according to some authorities, a partial transfer is effective to the extent of the compensation paid⁷ or payable.⁸ However, the employer has been held to be subrogated to all the rights of an employee or his dependents until he is reimbursed for the sums that he was required to pay.⁹

b. Cause of Action Based on Death of Employee

Under most, although not all, statutes, the right of an employer or insurer to succeed to an employee's cause of action against a tort-feasor applies to a cause of action for his death.

Under some compensation acts, the making of a lawful claim for compensation for the death of an employee,¹⁰ the payment of such claim,¹¹ the acceptance of an award of compensation,¹² or the failure of the dependents of the employee to bring an action against the wrongdoer after an acceptance of compensation,¹³ operates as an assignment of any cause of action that the personal representative of such employee may have against a third person. Under some statutes, the employer is subrogated to the rights of the dependents of a deceased employee against a third person who is liable,¹⁴ while under other statutes the employer is entitled to enforce the liability of the tort-feasor for his own benefit.¹⁵ Notwithstanding the act in express terms provides for the subrogation of the dependents of a deceased employee, however, the right of the employer or insurer to bring an action for death has been denied on the ground that the general statute authorizing an action for death designates the personal representative as the person to bring the action.¹⁶

Even in the absence of a reference to an action for death or to the rights of dependents or the representative of a deceased employee, provisions which permit an employer¹⁷ or an insurer¹⁸ to enforce the liability of a person other than the employer, who is liable, have been so construed as to include claims or rights based on the death of an employee; a similar rule has been applied to statutes which in terms subrogate the employer to the rights of an injured employee¹⁹ or provide that the acceptance of compensation shall operate as an assignment to the employer of all rights of the person entitled to compensation to recover damages against a third person.²⁰ Under a provision that an employer shall be subrogated to the rights of an "injured employee," the right of an employer to claim subrogation in respect of the rights of dependents of a deceased employee has, however, been denied.²¹

Under some acts, in case of the death of an employee resulting from the wrong of a person not in the same employ, the assignment to the person liable to pay compensation is effective to the extent,²² and only to the extent,²³ of the beneficial interest of such dependents or beneficiaries as are entitled to compensation under the act.

The provision for assignment has been regarded as applicable to the widow's cause of action,²⁴ and where the provisions of the compensation act so limit the so-called homicide statute as to provide that the recovery for the death of an employee shall be for the benefit of dependents, as discussed supra § 983, the right of subrogation extends to such right of action for the benefit of dependents.²⁵ son of the death of the employee, and the right of recovery cannot be defeated on the ground that, since insurer made the payments, the lessee did not suffer any loss.²⁶ The assignment of a cause of action for the death of an employee to the insurance carrier effected by the terms of some acts does not include the employer's right of action against a negligent third person based on a contract between the third person and the employer.²⁷

Action based on award to official where no person entitled to compensation. Some acts give the employer or insurer, who is liable for an award payable to an official where there is no person entitled to compensation for the death of an employee, a right of action against the third-person wrongdoer to recover the amount of the award,²⁸ which cause of action is in addition to that of the employee's next of kin to recover for wrongful death.²⁹ However, such provision does not apply where the employee was killed in another state and no such cause of action exists under the law of the other state.³⁰ Moreover, an insurer, who, after making a settlement with a deceased employee's widow, paid a sum to a state official pursuant to a statute of that state, even though not required to do so, since there was a person entitled to compensation, has been held not entitled to recover in another state from the wrongdoer for the sum paid to the state official.³¹ Since the statute authorizing recovery of the amount paid to an official does not operate retroactively, no recovery can be had of an amount paid before the enactment of the statute.³²

Cause of action created by statute of foreign state. The view has been taken that a provision that the making of a lawful claim for compensation against an employer for compensation for the injury or death of an employee shall operate as an assignment of any cause of action in tort which the employee or his personal representative may have against any other party does not effect an assignment of a cause of action for the death of an employee arising under the laws of another state, even though the widow of such employee has sought and obtained compensation under the act.³³ There is, however, authority for the view that the assignment effected by the operation of the compensation statute, as considered infra § 1002, applies to a cause of action based on the death of an employee arising under the laws of another state.³⁴ The compensation act of another state may not, it has been said, give insurer any right of action for the death of an employee, independent of that of the personal representative of the deceased employee, which may be enforced in the state of the forum.³⁵

Appointment of personal representative. Even though no personal representative of a deceased employee has been appointed, the right of an employer to relief against a third person has been recognized.³⁶

§ 997. Necessity, Sufficiency and Validity of Claim for Compensation

In order for an employer or insurer paying compensation to succeed to the rights of an employee or his dependents against a tort-feasor, a valid and sufficient claim for compensation is generally required to have been made.

Usually, in order that an employer or insurer may claim the benefit of a statutory provision transferring the employee's cause of action against a third person, it is required that the employee or his dependents shall have made a claim for,³⁷ or elected to receive,³⁸ compensation, and that the claim for compensation shall be one which may properly be allowed under the act.³⁹ Thus, under a statute providing that the making of a lawful claim for compensation shall operate as an assignment of a right of action against a third person, a valid claim against the employer is presupposed,⁴⁰ and if the claim is not a lawful one, making such claim does not operate as an assignment.⁴¹ So, it is necessary that the relation of master and servant or employer and employee shall exist between the injured or deceased employee and the person from whom compensation is claimed,⁴² and that the injury shall arise out of, or in the course of, the employment,⁴³ even though the employer has actually paid certain sums which are designated as compensation.⁴⁴ There is, however, apparently authority for the view that the fact that an injured employee who has received payments pursuant to an award was not entitled to it does not necessarily prevent the insurance carrier who paid the award from maintaining an action against a third person.⁴⁵

In an action by an employer to recover from a third person the amount of compensation paid to the employee, defendant cannot avoid recovery on the ground that the employer and employee were engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident, where the railroad car involved was not ready for transportation when the accident occurred.⁴⁶

Sufficiency of making claim. Within a provision that the making of any claim for compensation shall operate as an assignment, a letter to the state industrial commission from a person entitled to compensation stating that such person will apply for compensation does not constitute the making of a claim.⁴⁷ A claim by an employee may be lawful, however, so as to entitle insurer to subrogation even though it is made under an insurance policy which was defectively executed by the agent of insurer where such policy was subsequently ratified by insurer.⁴⁸

Necessity for written notice of injury. Where the act provides that the making of a lawful claim against the employer for compensation shall operate as an assignment to the employer of any cause of action which the personal representative of an employee may have against a third person for the death employment in general see supra §§ 208-257.

Position of employer in settling immaterial

Fact that employer, in settling with employee, took position that injuries did not arise out of course of employment, could not be taken as decisive in determining whether injuries actually arose out of course of employment, so as to entitle employer to recover from third party. Ill.—Wilson Garment Mfg. Co., for Use of Hardware Mut. Cas. Co. v. Edmonds, supra.

Injuries held to arise in course of employment

(1) Where elevator was only reasonable means provided for employee for coming to, and going from, work, injuries sustained by employee in elevator because of negligence of landlord were compensable as "arising out of and in course of employment" although employee's employer was not sole tenant of building and others had right to use elevator, and hence employer was entitled to recover from landlord. Ill.—Wilson Garment Mfg. Co., for Use of Hardware Mut. Cas. Co. v. Edmonds, supra.

(2) Fact that employee was taking lady in automobile which he was driving for road test, in course of which collision occurred, did not prevent trip from being "in course of his employment" so as to justify recovery against negligent third person by insurer.

of the employee, the fact that no written notice of the injury, as provided in the statute, was served on the employer does not prevent the assignment and subrogation where the employer had actual notice of the injury which, under the act, is equivalent to service of such written notice.⁴⁹

Rights as affected by person making claim. The view has been expressed that the making of a lawful claim for compensation works a subrogation of any right of action to recover for the death of an employee whether or not the person making the claim is the exclusive beneficiary for whom the action for such death would lie,⁵⁰ and where the act gives the right to recover compensation to the widow of a deceased employee and not to the minor children, the making of a claim by the widow is sufficient to transfer to the employer the right to recover for the death of such employee.⁵¹

§ 998. Necessity for, and Sufficiency of, Award of, Agreement for, or Payment of, Compensation

Whether an award of compensation to an employee or his dependents, or payment pursuant to such award, is necessary in order to allow an employer or insurer to succeed to the employee's rights against a tort-feasor depends on the language of the governing statute.

Under various statutory provisions transferring an employee's cause of action against a third person to the person paying compensation, it has been held or recognized that, in order that an employer or insurer may assert rights against a third person, there must be, as variously stated, an award of compensation,⁵² payment of compensation,⁵³ payment of, or the existence of the obligation or liability to pay, compensation,⁵⁴ an award and acceptance of compensation,⁵⁵ or an award or payment of compensation.⁵⁶

(1) Compensation insurance carrier cannot exercise right of subrogation to employee's claim until carrier has paid compensation for which employer is liable under act or assumed employer's liability therefor.

Where an award is required, the award, and not an election to claim compensation,⁵⁷ or the acceptance of compensation paid,⁵⁸ or the payment of compensation,⁵⁹ effects the transfer of the right of action contemplated by some acts. Under the federal Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, where the assignment of the cause of action is not effected because payment was not made under an award, the employer's right to subrogation is recognized apart from the question of assignment,⁶⁰ and the employer, by paying compensation without an award, foregoes only the right to control the employee's right of action against the wrongdoer;⁶¹ also, since the act makes the assignment effective on acceptance of compensation under an award, an assignment is effected even though the payment and acceptance of compensation precede the award.⁶² Where the right of subrogation depends on an award or payment of compensation, the right does not exist where neither a claim for, nor payment of, compensation has been made.⁶³

Under a provision that, if the injured employee takes under the act, his cause of action against another not in the same employ shall be assigned to the state for the benefit of the accident fund, the mere filing of a claim for compensation, followed by an award of the full statutory compensation, does not necessarily effect an assignment of such cause of action,⁶⁴ and the cause of action of an insurer entitled to subrogation may be contingent on the injured employee's prosecuting his claim for compensation to a successful conclusion.⁶⁵

Some acts do not require the payment of compensation in order that the employer or insurer may assert rights against a third person,⁶⁶ and where, by the terms of the act, the right of the employer is based on payment of, or liability to pay, compensation, the employer, or insurer treated as employer under the act, may assert his rights against the person liable when he becomes directly liable to pay compensation.⁶⁷

Under at least one act, the right of reimbursement is not necessarily postponed until the employer has paid, or by award has become obligated to pay, compensation.⁶⁸

Under an act which requires payment, the amount of payment is not material;⁶⁹ under another statute, if the consideration paid for an assignment of a cause of action is only that which was required to be paid under the compensation law, it is without force and effect.⁷⁰ It seems that payment of compensation made in compliance with the determination of a committee of arbitration has been regarded as sufficient where such determination was not reviewed,⁷¹ but the right of an insurer to reimbursement for payments which were purely voluntary has been denied.⁷²

While an employee's acceptance of compensation with full knowledge of the surrounding facts has been treated as effecting an assignment of the employee's rights, contemplated by the act,⁷³ the right of the employee and insurer to avoid, by agreement, the effect of the employee's acceptance of certain payments as operating as an assignment has been recognized.⁷⁴

Payment of salary as payment of compensation. Under at least one act, the payment by a municipal corporation of full salary to a municipal employee or officer during the period of disability has been regarded as the performance by such corporation of its obligation to pay compensation, so as to entitle it to reimbursement out of any recovery from a third person, notwithstanding a municipal ordinance requires the payment of full salary during the period of disability and such salary is in excess of the amount which the municipal corporation is required to pay by the compensation act.⁷⁵

Payment of compensation by insurance carrier as affecting employer's rights. According to some cases, where, by the terms of the act, the right of an employer to subrogation,⁷⁶ to assert rights against a third person,⁷⁷ or to claim reimbursement⁷⁸ is confined to an employer who has paid compensation, or has become liable therefor, payment of compensation by the insurance carrier is not sufficient; but there is authority for the view that, where compensation is paid for the death of an employee, the employer is vested with sufficient title to maintain an action against the third person for such death notwithstanding the payments to dependents of compensation are being made by insurer.⁷⁹

Fixing amount. Under a provision that the employer may bring legal proceedings against a person other than the employer to recover the damages sustained, not exceeding the aggregate amount of compensation payable under the act, the employer may not bring an action against a third person until the amount to be paid the employee is fixed.⁸⁰ In order to satisfy this requirement, the amount may be fixed either by award or by agreement.⁸¹

Ill.—Wilson Garment Mfg. Co., for Use of Hardware Mut. Casualty

Under a provision that, if compensation is awarded, the employer or his insurer shall have a right to recover from a person other than the employer not to exceed indemnity paid or payable to the injured employee, it is not necessary that a formal award should be made in order to authorize the employer or insurer to enforce the liability of such other person;⁸² a voluntary agreement that needs only to be filed in order to be enforced as an award is sufficient.⁸³

Effect of invalidity of award; attack by third persons. Under a provision that, if compensation is claimed and awarded or paid under the act, the employer or insurer may enforce for his benefit the liability of a person other than the employer, the view has been taken that it is the fact, and not the validity, of an award which subrogates an insurer to the rights of the injured employee or of the dependents of a deceased employee,⁸⁴ and which authorizes insurer to enforce the liability of the tort-feasor.⁸⁵ So, the validity of the award cannot be attacked by defendant tort-feasor in an action by insurer for injuries to,⁸⁶ or the death of,⁸⁷ the employee.

However, there is authority for the view that defendant third person may attack the validity of an award or judgment for compensation,⁸⁸ by asserting, in the action against it, every defense that could have been interposed by the employer or insurer in the compensation proceedings,⁸⁹ and it has also been held that the validity of the award or judgment for compensation is not res judicata as to the tort-feasor.⁹⁰

§ 999. Notice to Bring Action

Unless it is waived, there must be compliance with a statutory requirement that the employer or insurer give the employee written notice to bring an action against a tort-feasor in order to succeed to his rights against the tort-feasor.

Under an act providing that, if the employee fails to bring an action against a third person within a specified time after a written notice so to do is given by the employer or his insurer, then the employer or his insurer shall succeed to the right of the employee to maintain such action, there is no transfer of the right to sue in the absence of any demand on the employee to bring an action.⁹¹ However, since such requirement is for the benefit of the employee,⁹² he may waive it,⁹³ and where there was no written demand on the employee to bring the action, but he does not disavow or repudiate an action commenced by the insurer, it will not be dismissed.⁹⁴

§ 1000. Notice of Bringing Action

A requirement that an employer or an employee bringing an action against a third person shall notify the employee or the employer is for their protection, and the third party may not complain of noncompliance.

Under some acts, if either the employee or his dependents, or the employer, shall bring suit against a third person, the person bringing the action shall notify the other in writing of such fact.⁹⁹ Such a provision is intended for the protection of the employee and of the employer,¹ and the giving of such notice by the employee is neither an essential ingredient of his cause of action against the wrongdoer² nor a condition precedent to his bringing of the action;³ where neither employer nor employee complains of noncompliance with the statute, defendant may not complain.⁴

In the absence of a statute requiring it, such notice need not be given.⁵

Action by insurer against employee. Where a compensation insurer has actual knowledge of the facts, the failure of an employee, who accepted compensation from the insurer, to notify the employer that he had filed a claim with the third-party tortfeasor for the injuries for which compensation had been paid is unimportant in an action by the insurer against the employee to recover the compensation paid.⁶

§ 1001. Notice to Tort-Feasor

A tort-feasor may, under statutory provision, be entitled to notice of an award of, or agreement to pay, compensation before an action may be brought against him by a subrogee of the employee's rights.

A provision of the compensation act that, in order to acquire a right against a third person for compensation paid, the employer shall file with the third person or corporation liable, at any time prior to payment, a statement of the compensation agreement or award as between the employer and employee contemplates a written notice,⁷ which must be filed;⁸ the notice should contain a statement of an agreement to pay compensation or of an award for compensation.⁹ The notice need not be signed by the employer,¹⁰ and may be filed by his agent.¹¹

The view has been expressed that the employer¹² or insurer,¹³ on filing the requisite notice with the third person, succeeds to the rights of the employee against such third person for amounts paid to the employee as compensation under the act.

The fact that a tort-feasor is not immediately notified of the occurrence of an accident is not sufficient to deny recovery for compensation paid.¹⁴

Notice of claim. Where a statute requires that notice of claim be filed with a town within a specified period after the cause of action arises, the failure of the claimant or the insurer to give such notice defeats the insurer's right to recover against the town for its negligence.¹⁵

Action by state against county. Under a provision for assignment to the state for the benefit of the accident fund if compensation is taken, where a county is the alleged wrongdoer, whether or not a claim filed with the county by the widow of a deceased employee, who ultimately elected to take compensation, has been regarded as immaterial in respect of the right of the state to maintain an action against the county.¹⁶

§ 1002. Transfer of Cause of Action or Claim Effected by Statute; Necessity for Formal Assignment

A provision in a compensation act relating to the succession of an employer or insurer to an employee's right of action against a third person may itself effect a transfer of the right of action, when the statutory conditions are met, without any formal assignment.

Under statutory provisions relating to the transfer to, or vesting in, the employer or the compensation insurer of the employee's right of action against a tort-feasor, no formal assignment is regarded as necessary where the conditions contemplated by the provision exist.¹⁷ In such circumstances, the transfer may be effected by a provision for the subrogation of the employer¹⁸ or of the insurance carrier¹⁹ to the rights of the injured employee, a provision for the assignment to the employer or insurance carrier of the employee's right of action,²⁰ or a provision for the enforcement by the employer of the liability of a person other than the employer if compensation is paid.²¹ In the absence of a statutory requirement for the approval of the assignment by the compensation board, the transfer is effected without such approval.²²

to assign any right of action he may have against a third-person wrongdoer, acceptance of compensation by an employee does not effect an assignment of such right of action to an employer,²³ and the employer has no right to bring an action against the tort-feasor without a formal assignment from the employee.²⁴ However, the failure of an employee to assign to the person liable to pay compensation, which assignment is, under an act, a condition precedent to the employee's right to compensation, as considered infra § 1011, does not defeat the transfer of his rights to the person liable for compensation where the employee has received the compensation.²⁵

Under a statutory provision authorizing an employee to elect to receive compensation or recover damages against a tort-feasor by giving notice of his choice to the employer and the compensation commission, and providing that the giving of notice to receive compensation shall operate as an assignment of the cause of action to the employer, the employer cannot recover from the tort-feasor in the absence of the notice from the employee.²⁶

Where the act effects the transfer of the cause of action, questions as to whether a cause of action in tort²⁷ or for wrongful death²⁸ is assignable, and as to the consent of the debtor or tort-feasor,²⁹ are determined by the provisions of the act, and rules against the splitting of causes of action, if the act provides for a partial assignment, yield to such provisions.³⁰ Also, where the state of the forum allows the assignment of a cause of action for personal injuries, as considered in Assignments § 33, the public policy of that state is not contravened by the recognition therein of an assignment under the compensation law of another state.³¹

§ 1003. Exclusive or Concurrent Right as between Employer or Insurers and Employee or Dependents to Sue and Recover

- a. In general
- b. Double recovery and effect of judgment

a. In General

Whether an employer or insurer has an exclusive right, or a right concurrent with that of the employee or his personal representative, to bring an action against a tort-feasor depends on the applicable compensation statute.

Some compensation acts expressly recognize the right either of the employee or of the employer to sue the tort-feasor where the employer has paid, or has become obligated to pay, compensation.³² So, the fact that an insurer had assisted a deceased employee's heirs in maintaining a death action against the tort-feasor and had therein successfully asserted a lien for a death claim which it had paid does not preclude it, on the theory that it had split its cause of action, from maintaining a subsequent action against the tort-feasor to recover the medical and burial expenses which it had paid.³³

According to some cases, under a provision which subrogates an insurer to the rights of the employee against a third-person wrongdoer, the right of the insurer to sue such person becomes absolute and unqualified if the employee duly elects to take compensation;³⁴ where the employee has received compensation, he has no cause of action against the tort-feasor,³⁵ and the wrongdoer may be subjected to only one action for damages.³⁶

Where, under the act, the employee or dependents of a deceased employee have a beneficial interest in the amount recoverable from such person if such amount is more than sufficient to indemnify the employer or insurer, as discussed infra § 1040, usually the right of the employer³⁷ or insurer³⁸ who is entitled to subrogation under the act is not exclusive, and the employee³⁹ or, in case of his death, his dependents or personal representative⁴⁰ has a concurrent right to bring the action.

Under an amendment to a statute providing for the subrogation of the compensation fund to the rights of an employee receiving compensation, even though the claim arose prior to the date of the amendment, an employee or his dependents, who had a claim, on that date, or thereafter, against a third party, have the exclusive right to bring the action.⁴¹

Under some acts permitting the employer or other person liable for compensation to enforce the liability of a person other than the employer, the employee or his personal representative has no property right in the maintenance of an action by the insurer,⁴² and the right to bring an action against the

wrongdoer belongs exclusively to the person who pays the compensation⁴³ for a specified time after the award.⁴⁴ After the expiration of the specified period the injured employee, his representative, or dependents may sue such third person as discussed infra § 1004; but even then the employer or insurer may also sue whether or not the employee, his representatives, or dependents sue.⁴⁵ However, under such a statute an insurer is not authorized to bring a death action where the entire cause of action for death was not transferred to it by the payment of compensation to only some of the persons who had a beneficial interest in the cause of action for death.⁴⁶

Where, under the act, the election to take, or the award of, compensation operates to assign, to the person liable to pay compensation, the entire cause of action, as considered supra § 996, after an election or award, the employee has no right of action⁴⁷ and only the person liable to pay compensation is entitled to sue.⁴⁸ A like rule has been recognized notwithstanding the act gives the employee a certain beneficial interest in a recovery by the employer.⁴⁹ Under such a statute an employer paying compensation for an employee's death may maintain a suit against a tort-feasor if the dependents of the employee who accept compensation would be entitled to the entire recovery if they brought the death action;⁵⁰ if their interest is less than the whole, the employer is not authorized to maintain the action for wrongful death,⁵¹ but he may, if necessary, institute appropriate proceedings to compel an administrator to bring the suit and account for the proceeds which the employer is entitled to receive.⁵²

Where, however, under a provision that the receipt of compensation shall operate as an assignment to the employer or insurer to the extent of the liability of the employer to the employee, the assignment is regarded as a partial assignment, as discussed supra § 996, the right of the employee to sue has been recognized.⁵³

Under a statute providing that a person taking compensation may bring an action against the tortfeasor for the damages sustained only within a specified period of time, and that thereafter the cause of action is assigned to the person liable for the payment of compensation, the person taking compensation may not bring the action after the assignment, as discussed infra § 1014, the cause of action then becomes the property of the person liable for the payment of compensation,⁵⁴ and only that person may bring the action.⁵⁵ Under such a statute, actions cannot be instituted by both the employee or his representative, and the employer or insurer, at the same time.⁵⁶

Even though the employer and the insurer have made voluntary payments to the employee, in the absence of an award, where the employee has filed a notice of intention to sue the third party, the employer has no rights against the third party on account of the employee's injury until he has succeeded in his own purported cause of action.⁵⁷

Under some acts a distinction is made, as to the exclusiveness of the right, between claims against persons other than the employer, who are bound by the act, and claims against persons other than the employer, who are not bound by the act.⁵⁸

Joint wrongdoers. The mere commencement of an action by an injured employee against one joint wrongdoer does not bar an action by the compensation insurer against the others.⁵⁹

b. Double Recovery and Effect of Judgment

Generally the payment or recovery of a judgment for plaintiff in an action by an employee or his personal representative against a tort-feasor is a bar to an action by the employer or insurer.

the employer or insurer is presented by the payment⁶⁰ or recovery⁶¹ of a judgment for plaintiff in an action prosecuted in the name of the employee against the tort-feasor, or the payment⁶² or recovery⁶³ of a judgment for plaintiff in an action prosecuted in the name of the personal representative of a deceased employee for the death of the latter. Where the employee has recovered full damages in an action against the wrongdoer, the right of the employer to maintain an action against the latter for the amount of compensation paid has been denied notwithstanding the act gives the employer the right to indemnity from the third person and to subrogation.⁶⁴

Even where the act permits concurrent actions by the employer or insurer and by the employee or dependents, in no event can there be more than one recovery for the same tort.⁶⁵

There is authority for the view that, while, if an administrator of a deceased employee duly elects to bring an action against a third person whose negligence caused the death, such third person cannot again be subjected to an action by the employer or insurer,⁶⁶ a judgment for the deceased employee's administrator in an action against the wrongdoer, commenced after a compensation agreement was approved and payments were made thereunder, is not a bar to the employer's right to recover from the wrongdoer, at least where the employer was not a party to the action by the administrator.⁶⁷

The fact that an insurer had assisted a deceased employee's heirs in maintaining a death action against the tort-feasor and had therein successfully asserted a lien for a death claim which it had paid does not preclude it, on the theory that it is subjecting the tort-feasor to a double liability, from maintaining a subsequent action against the tort-feasor to recover the medical and burial expenses which it had paid.⁶⁸

§ 1004. Waiver or Loss of Right by Employer or Insurer and Failure or Refusal to Sue

The right of an employer or its insurer to proceed against a tort-feasor for an injury to an employee receiving compensation may be waived, or lost by estoppel, as by failure to sue or to sue within the required time.

The benefit of, or rights acquired under, provisions of the compensation acts relating to the transfer to an employer or its compensation insurer of an employee's right of action against a tort-feasor may be waived by the employer or insurer,⁶⁹ or lost

Effect of failure to intervene in action by employee against wrongdoer see infra § 1021.

Authorization of representation by claimant's attorney

Where state insurance fund by letter authorized claimant's attorney to represent interest of state in at-

by estoppel,⁷⁰ and if, by an agreement between the employer and the employee, the right to bring an action against the tort-feasor is left with the employee, the tort-feasor may not complain.⁷¹ However, where a cause of action has been assigned by operation of law to an employer's compensation insurer, the employer cannot disturb the insurer's right of action by any act to which the insurer is not a party.⁷²

A provision permitting a compensation beneficiary or his representative to enforce in his own name the liability of a person other than the employer where the employer or insurer fails to sue within a specified time after written demand by the compensation beneficiary is to be liberally construed to effect the beneficial purpose intended and to prevent a failure of remedy;⁷³ on failure of the employer or insurer to bring action against the person other than the employer within the specified time after demand, the right of action passes to the employee,⁷⁴ and the employee,⁷⁵ or, in case of his death, his personal representative,⁷⁶ may prosecute the action in his own name, the employer retaining only an interest in the proceeds where the act provides for an accounting by the employee.⁷⁷

Failure of the employer to bring action within the specified time after demand by the employee is deemed an express waiver of the employer's right of action.⁷⁸ In such case, however, the employer's right of action continues until and unless he fails to pursue his remedy for the specified time after demand.⁷⁹

Under some acts permitting the employer or other person liable for compensation to enforce the liability of a person other than the employer, the person who pays compensation has the exclusive right for a specified time after an award to bring an action against the tort-feasor, as discussed supra § 1003; after the expiration of the specified period the injured employee, his representative, or dependents may sue such third person.⁸⁰

Even in the absence of any provision for a demand by the employees or dependents, under some statutory provisions the right of the injured employee⁸¹ or of the dependents of a deceased employee⁸² to sue on the employer's or insurer's refusal or failure to sue has been recognized.

On the other hand, where, under the act, the right to sue a third person is transferred to the insurer on the payment of compensation, the view has been taken that the insurer is not under a duty to prosecute an action against a person other than the employer,⁸³ notwithstanding a provision giving the employee the right to a share in the amount of recovery from such person in excess of the compensation paid;⁸⁴ whether or not the insurer⁸⁵ or the employer, if the transfer is to the employer,⁸⁶ will sue is for the insurer or employer to determine, and an employee who accepts compensation may not complain that the claim against the third party was al-tempting to procure reimbursement for amounts of compensation paid, fund waived its rights to bring action against third-party tort-feasor and would be bound by judgment for or against claimant suing third-party to extent of fund's interests.

lowed to become barred by lapse of time.⁸⁷ An employee has no legal right to require an insurer, to whom the right to sue has been transferred, to bring an action against the third party⁸⁸ or to prosecute it diligently.⁸⁹ Under such a statute, the refusal of the insurer or employer to bring an action does not permit the maintenance of an action by the employee⁹⁰ for the benefit of himself and the insurer.⁹¹

Waiver on failure of employee to elect. Notwithstanding a provision that failure on the part of the injured employee to file with the employer within a specified time notice of the employee's intention to pursue the employee's remedy against the negligent third person shall operate as an election to take compensation and as an assignment of any cause of action in tort against any other person for the injury, the employer may waive its right to proceed against the third person where the employee has so failed to elect⁹² and permit the employee to sue,⁹³ and the third person has no ground to complain of such waiver.⁹⁴

Assignment by employer or insurer as waiver. According to some cases, an assignment by the employer or insurer to the employee operates as an express waiver of the right to bring the action,⁹⁵ even though the attempted reassignment to the employee is ineffective as an assignment.⁹⁶

Denial of liability for compensation and of interest in claim against third person. An employer may, by a denial of liability for compensation and of an interest in the claim against the third person, lose the right to bring an action against a third person who has caused the death of an employee.⁹⁷

Assisting employee or dependents to recover from third person. An employer who, having knowledge of negotiations on a claim between a deceased employee's dependents and the tort-feasor, advises one of the dependents in respect of a settlement of the claim of the dependents against the tort-feasor, waives whatever rights it may once have had against the tort-feasor.⁹⁸ A person who has paid compensation and who assists in compelling the third person to pay full damages in an action by the injured employee is estopped to demand indemnity from such third person.⁹⁹ However, the fact that the insurer had assisted an employee's heirs in maintaining a death action against a tort-feasor and had successfully asserted therein a lien for a death claim which it had paid does not preclude it from maintaining a subsequent action against the tort-feasor to recover the medical and funeral expenses which it had paid, on the theory that it had waived its right to recover that amount by not asserting it in the death action,¹ or on the theory that it had become estopped to pursue the action by procuring partial recoupment.²

Employer not complying with act. An employer who has failed to obtain insurance is not, under at least one act, subrogated to the right of action against a third person.³

Lien of employer or insurer. The right to a lien, under an act providing that the court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against any judgment of the employee against a person other than the employer, the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation, may be waived by an employer⁴ or by an insurer otherwise entitled to assert the lien;⁵ and there is a waiver by an employer where, after receiving the required statutory notice of the commencement of an action against such other by the employee, he fails to assert, and timely to apply for, the allowance of his lien.⁶ So the right to assert the lien may be lost by estoppel by con-

The assertion of a lien, on an employee's possible recovery, by a compensation insurer, is not inconsistent with its later assertion of ownership of the cause of action based on the employee's failure to commence an action against the tort-feasor.⁹

Deprivation of insurer's rights by a clause in a contract between a stevedoring company and a shipowner that, in insurance policies, the shipowner shall be named as an additional insured, or the insurer shall waive all right of subrogation against the shipowner, cannot be accomplished in the absence of a showing of such provision as part of the policy,¹⁰ or unless the contract was brought home to the insurance company.¹¹

§ 1005. Settlement or Release by Employer or Insurer

Subject to statutory requirements, an employer or insurer to whom an employee's rights against a tort-feasor have passed may generally release or settle the claim, or compromise a judgment recovered against the tort-feasor.

Where a compensated employee's cause of action against a tort-feasor has passed to an employer or its insurer, that party may release or settle the claim,¹² without the consent of the employee or his dependents.¹³ Also, the right of the employer or its insurer to dismiss the action and discharge the claim has been recognized.¹⁴

It may be required that the compromise or settlement of a claim be approved by an authorized judge¹⁵ or by the compensation board.¹⁶ Under some acts, the insurer does not have the right to adjust or compromise the liability of a person other than the employer without notice to the injured employee or his beneficiaries and the approval of the industrial accident board.¹⁷

Where both the employer and the employee have a right of action against the third-party tort-feasor, as considered supra § 1003, a settlement by the employer cannot affect the right of the employee.¹⁸

An insurer to whom a cause of action is assigned can compromise a judgment recovered against the tort-feasor¹⁹ without the consent of the employee.²⁰ Where judicial approval of the compromise is not required, a compromise of a judgment recovered against a tort-feasor in a death action need not be approved by the surrogate, even though infants' rights are involved, because the duties and prerogatives of the assignee are defined by the compensation law and not by the decedent estate law or the surrogate's court act.²¹

§ 1006. Assignment by Employer or Insurer

Authorities differ as to whether an employer or insurer may assign an employee's cause of action against a tort-feasor.

Although the assignability of a cause of action against a tort-feasor by a subrogee of the injured employee or his dependents has been denied,²³ under other statutory provisions the right of an employer²⁴ or an insurer²⁵ to assign a right of action has been recognized.

In such case the assignment operates as an express waiver of the employer's right to bring the action, as considered supra § 1004, and the employer's assignee is the real party in interest and may sue thereon.²⁶ An attempted assignment by an insurer does not transfer anything where the insurer has not acquired any rights against the third person.²⁷

§ 1007. Settlement or Release by Employee or Personal Representative

Generally, a settlement by an employee of his cause of action against a tort-feasor does not affect the rights of the employer or insurer to recover from the tort-feasor.

The right of an employee who receives compensation to settle an action, brought by him against a tort-feasor, without the consent or approval of his employer or the employer's compensation insurer, has been recognized;²⁸ but where an award of compensation operates as an assignment to an insurer, the right of the employee who has received compensation to settle the action against the wrongdoer has been denied.²⁹

According to some cases, a settlement between an employee and a third person, without the consent of the employer or its insurer, does not destroy,³⁰ or otherwise affect,³¹ its right of recovery against a third person; and the employer's right to have questions of liability and recovery adjudicated remains where the settlement was for less than its liability to the employee under the compensation act.³²

Furthermore, an employer who has made compensation and medical payments, without an award, is entitled to maintain an action for reimbursement against a tort-feasor who, with notice of the employer's claim, has settled the employee's action against it,³³ and this rule is applicable to an insurer's right to recover, from a tort-feasor, for medical treatment furnished to an injured employee who did not claim compensation.³⁴

The rule as to the effect of a settlement applies where a settlement is made without the requisite statutory consent³⁵ of the employer³⁶ or the insurer.³⁷

Where the act provides that the making of a claim for compensation shall operate as an assignment, a settlement between the employee and the third person is a nullity in so far as the employer or insurer is concerned, where the employee has made a valid claim for compensation.³⁸

Under a statute requiring an employee to give the employer a notice of election to receive compensation or to proceed to recover damages against the tort-feasor, his release of the liability of the tort-feasor without having given such notice does not affect the right of the employer or insurer to recover from the tort-feasor.³⁹

The effectiveness of a settlement between the employee and the third person has, however, been recognized⁴⁰ where the required consent was obtained.⁴¹

Employee's covenant not to sue. The view has been expressed that a covenant of an employee not to sue a third person does not deprive the employer⁴² or the insurer⁴³ of any right of subrogation.

Void or voidable settlement. While a settlement between an employee and a third person without notice to the employer may be voidable at the election of the employer,⁴⁴ it is not necessarily void,⁴⁵ and the employee may not successfully assert the invalidity of the settlement where the result of invalidity would be injurious to the interests of the employer.⁴⁶

Enjoining settlement; other remedies. Although there is authority to the effect that an employer may have the making of a settlement enjoined,⁴⁸ where the legal liability of the tort-feasor has not yet been established, the insurer which paid compensation to the employee is not entitled to enjoin the making of a voluntary settlement between the employee and the tort-feasor⁴⁹ to have a receiver appointed⁵⁰ or to have any funds impounded.⁵¹

§ 1008. Who Treated as Third Person or Person Other Than Employer

Whether a person is to be treated as a third person, liable to an employer or insurer in an action brought by either after injury to an employee, depends on the statute under which the action is brought.

One who is not the immediate or direct employer, but who is, under the act, liable for compensation for an injury to, or the death of, an employee ordinarily is not liable as a third person in an action for damages by the employer or insurer.⁵²

Under a particular statute, an employer may maintain an action for injury to, or death of, an employee against a third party who is under the compensation act,⁵³ and only against such person,⁵⁴ or who might otherwise be under the act, but who has elected not to be bound by it;⁵⁵ but such action may not be maintained against one who is exempt from the operation of the act.⁵⁶

A person who contracts with the employer of the injured employee for the performance of certain work by such employer has been regarded as a "person other than the employer" against whom the insurer could assert a claim,⁵⁷ and the right of the insurer to recover from an independent contractor who has contracted to perform certain work for the employer, whose employee was injured has been recognized.⁵⁸ A third person against whom an employer may bring an action need not be one participating in the original injury to the employee.⁵⁹

Fellow servant of injured employee and agent of employer. Under a provision of a statute subrogating an employer to the rights of an injured employee against a third person, who is liable for such injury, a third person is one with whom the employee does not have a master and servant relationship under the act.⁶⁰ Accordingly, an injured person's coemployee, fellow servant, or foreman is a third person within the act.⁶¹

assigns any right to recover damages which the employee may have against any other party for his injury to the employer, refers exclusively to strangers, and does not refer to people conducting the employer's business, such as coemployees or fellow servants of the injured employee.⁶²

Under a statute assigning the rights of an injured employee against a wrongdoer, who is not in the same employ, to the employer, if the wrongdoer was in the same employ, the employer is not entitled to recover in an action against him.⁶³ The term "in the same employ" must be read in its setting in the statute,⁶⁴ and, even though the legislature did not intend to give the right of action to the employer where the injury arose out of the exigencies of the undertaking upon which the employees were jointly engaged,⁶⁵ the employees cannot be said to have been in the same employ where the injury arose from an act of frivolity when the employees were on the way to work.⁶⁶

Liability insurer. A compensation insurer who has paid compensation is entitled to recover against the tort-feasor's liability insurer, notwithstanding a provision in the liability policy excluding liability thereunder as to any obligation for which the insured thereunder, or any company as his insurer, might be held liable under the compensation law, since the insured's liability arises from his wrongful act, the nature of which is not changed by its recognition in the compensation act.⁶⁷

In Massachusetts. Under statutory provisions requiring an insured general contractor, or an insured owner of the premises where work is done, to pay compensation for compensable injuries to employees of any contractor or subcontractor as though such contractor or subcontractor were the person insured

under the act, one engaged in that common employment as a contractor,⁶⁸ subcontractor,⁶⁹ or employee of the common employer⁷⁰ cannot be a person other than the insured, and consequently is not liable in an action by the one liable to pay compensation; the insurance of the general contractor or common employer throws its shadow over the whole work,⁷¹ and covers and protects all employees engaged in the common employment.⁷²

In the application of this rule, it is immaterial whether a subcontractor is also insured under the act;⁷³ the essential thing in the application of the rule is the existence of a common employer who is an insured person under the act, and who is doing, or having done, work by contract in or about premises specified in the act, which work is part of, or a process in, the trade or business of the insured person on whose premises the work is being done.⁷⁴

Where the general contractor is the common employer as to all parties involved in the action, and is insured, recovery may not be had against an employee of that common employer on the theory that, since the work was being done for the state, it was the common employer.⁷⁵

A statutory provision allowing an insurer to enforce the common-law liability of a person other than the insured for injuries to an employee comprehends a person, whether a contractor, subcontractor, or employee, who is not protected by the insurance of the common employer.⁷⁶

Where a worker is not an employee of a contractor by dint of a contract of hire, he does not come within the orbit of common employment;⁷⁷ accordingly, the contractor, being a person other than the employer, is liable to an insurer for compensation payments made to the injured employee.⁷⁸

Also, where the work being done, in the course of which an employee of the owner of the premises is injured, is not a part of, or a process in, the business of the owner, but is ancillary to it, the contractor performing the work is a person other than the insured and is liable for the compensation paid.⁷⁹

§ 1009. Rights of Employer or Insurer Measured by Rights of Employee or Dependents

An employer or insurer to whom an employee's right of action against a third person passes stands in the position of the employee, and acquires only such rights against the third person as the employee had.

The employer or insurer stands in the position of the employee, or of the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee, under provisions of compensation acts for the subrogation of,⁸⁰ assignment to,⁸¹ or enforcement of rights by,⁸² the employer or insurer, and also under a conventional subrogation.⁸³

An employer occupies no better position than the employee would have occupied if he had sued.⁸⁴ The employer or insurer, to whom the employee's cause of action is transferred, acquires such rights,⁸⁵ and only such rights,⁸⁶ against a third person as the injured employee or the dependents or personal representative of a deceased employee would have against the third person.

Accordingly, where the right of the employee to receive compensation from his employer is the exclusive remedy against the employer, as considered supra § 918, after the compensation has been accepted by an employee's dependents, an insurer has no cause of action on which to proceed against the employer responsible for the death.⁸⁷ However, the fact that the personal representative cannot recover both compensation under the statute and damages from the tort-feasor does not affect the right of the person paying the compensation to maintain the action against the tort-feasor.⁸⁸

- (2) In action for amount of award to state officer where no person entitled to compensation

(1) General Rules

A tort-feasor's liability for injuries to an employee, or for his death, in an action by the employer or insurer, depends on the tort-feasor's liability to the employee or his dependents; such liability must be established by an action at law or an admission of liability, and a settlement between the tort-feasor and the employee may be insufficient. In the employer's or insurer's action, the tort-feasor may interpose whatever defense he has against the employee.

In an action against the third-party tort-feasor by the person liable for the payment of compensation, the test of the third person's liability is his liability to the injured employee or to his dependents;⁸⁹ an employer, or his insurer, has no cause of action against a tort-feasor unless the employee or his personal representative has a cause of action against such party.⁹⁰

Under a statute subrogating an employer to the rights of a deceased employee's dependents,⁹¹ or a statute assigning such rights to an insurer,⁹² where a dependent of a deceased employee has no cause of action under a wrongful death statute against the person causing the death, the person who paid compensation cannot recover, from the person causing the death, for the compensation paid to that dependent; under a statute giving an employer the right to recover compensation paid to a dependent from a person who was legally liable to the employee for damages, where this right is not in the nature of subrogation, as considered supra § 994(c), the employer may recover even though the dependent has no right of recovery on the employee's cause of action.⁹³

In view of the test of liability of the tort-feasor in an action by an employer or insurer, if the employee,⁹⁴ or the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee,⁹⁵ could not recover, the employer or insurer is not entitled to recover. Thus, in order that an employer⁹⁶ or his insurer⁹⁷ may be entitled to assert rights against a third person, the circumstances surrounding the injury to the employee must be such as to create liability of such third person, and it has been held, or recognized, that the third person is not liable in the absence of any actionable wrong on his part causing the injury to, or the death of, the employee.⁹⁸

Although the liability of the third party need not be judicially established before an insurer is entitled to assert its claim for subrogation,⁹⁹ the liability must be established either by an action at law¹ or an admission of liability on the part of the third person.² A settlement between the employee and a third person of a claim against the latter does not necessarily constitute an acknowledgment or admission,³ or an adjudication,⁴ of the liability of such third person, and the view has been expressed that it is not even evidence of legal liability.⁵

In an action by or on behalf of the employer or insurer, the third person may interpose such defenses as he might interpose against the employee or against the personal representative of a deceased employee.⁶ The fact that an insurer has filed a lien in an action by the employee against a tort-feasor other than the defendants in the instant action, all of whom may be liable for the injury, is no defense to an action by the insurer to recover compensation paid.⁷

Also, where an employee's cause of action is assigned to the state for the benefit of the state insurance fund, the fund must be treated as any other insurance carrier,⁸ and its rights and obligations are treated as separate and apart from the state's general liabilities;⁹ accordingly, the fund is entitled to the full benefit of the statutory assignment of the cause of action to it, unimpaired by the result of any quarrel between the tort-feasor and the state arising out of the circumstances from which the employee's injuries resulted.¹⁰

to the rights of an employer against a tort-feasor is not bound by any accord, settlement, and satisfaction between the employer and the tort-feasor, to which the insurer was not a party,¹¹ and it cannot be used as a defense to an action by the insurer against the tort-feasor.¹²

A subcontractor who has elected not to become subject to the compensation act cannot avoid liability to the contractor for the amount of an award for funeral expenses of a deceased employee of the subcontractor, on the ground that the effect of recovery by the contractor would be to subject the subcontractor to the provisions of the act even though he had not elected to become subject thereto, since, as a result of his voluntary acceptance of the contract, the burden of the statute is deemed to be voluntarily assumed as an incident to the contract.¹³

The liability need not be the sole liability of the third person in order to permit a recovery by the employer or person called on to pay compensation,¹⁴ and the liability includes liability for the acts of defendant's employees.¹⁵

Action for medical expenses. A prior judgment for a defendant tort-feasor, in the employee's action for personal injuries, is not res judicata in the employer's action for medical expenses incurred by it in the treatment of the employee, since the em-

Statute held to refer to subrogation. Provision that, for subrogation purposes, any payment, by or on behalf of third party involved in injury of employee, to such employee, shall be considered as having been so paid as damages resulting from and because injury was caused under circumstances creating legal liability against third party, refers to rights of subrogation.

Reason for rule

Statutory assignment of employee's cause of action against another than employer to state for benefit of state insurance fund after expiration of statutory time for commencement of action by employee carries to state merely in name whatever cause of action employee might have had against such third party solely for benefit of fund, which is real owner of any such subrogated action.

ployee was never entitled to recover the cost of the medical expenses.¹⁶

Employer's agreement to indemnify third person. The rights of an insurer are not necessarily defeated by the fact that the employer had agreed to indemnify the person who caused the injury to,¹⁷ or the death of,¹⁸ the employee.

The fact that the employer was insured against loss occasioned by the payment of compensation to an injured workman, as permitted by the compensation act, does not bar the employer's rights against a third person under the act;¹⁹ and an insurer is not barred from bringing suit against a contractor by a provision in the contract with its insured requiring the latter to carry compensation insurance.²⁰

Agreement imposing liability for insurance premiums on defendant third person. The fact that the employer and defendant had, prior to the death of an employee, entered into a contract pursuant to which defendant would ultimately pay the premiums for the insurance of employees does not relieve defendant from liability in an action by such employer or its insurer based on the employee's injury or death.²¹

Action by employer for reimbursement against employee. In an action by an employer against an employee, who has recovered against a tort-feasor, for reimbursement of compensation paid, the employee is not permitted to set up the defense that the jury in the suit against the tort-feasor had made a deduction in its verdict equal to the amount received by the employee as compensation.²²

(2) In Action for Amount of Award to State Officer Where No Person Entitled to Compensation

paid to a state officer in the absence of anyone entitled to compensation, even though the tort-feasor had settled a prior action by the personal representative of the employee against him, he can interpose any defense to the action which he has or ever had; but this is not so where the prior action resulted in a judgment against the tort-feasor.

In the absence of any wrongdoing on the part of a third person, no recovery may be had in an action by an insurer to recover from the alleged wrongdoer, pursuant to a provision of the act, the amount of an award paid to a state officer under a provision for such award where there is no person entitled to compensation for the death of an employee;²³ and the view has been expressed, where the defendant settled a prior action against him by the personal representative of the deceased employee in an action for the latter's death for an amount in excess of the compensation payable, that defendant could avail himself of any defense which he has or ever had,²⁴ and that he may show, if he can, that there could have been no recovery in such prior action.²⁵ However, it has been held that, where there was a judgment for the personal representative in such prior action, such judgment is binding on defendant in respect of its liability in the action by insurer for the amount of the award where the issues and burden of proof, as to such liability, are the same in both actions.²⁶

b. Employee's Fault, Contributory Negligence, or Assumption of Risk

An employee's contributory negligence will defeat the action by his employer or its insurer against the tort-feasor; but this is not true of the employee's alleged assumption of risk.

The contributory negligence of the employee will defeat the right of recovery against the third-party tort-feasor by the employer²⁷ or will defeat the right of recovery against the third-party tort-feasor by the insurer.²⁸ General rules as to what constitutes contributory negligence, considered in Negligence §§ 116-173, apply in actions by an employer or insurer against a tort-feasor.²⁹

Assumption of risk. The view has been taken that a third person may not defeat liability to an employer³⁰ or insurer³¹ on the alleged ground that the employee had assumed the risk.

Fault of employee. An insurer cannot recover if the employee was at fault in being injured, even though the defendant was not justified in injuring him.³²

Action for medical expenses. The legislature, it has been held, did not intend to permit an employee by any act of his own to foreclose any additional rights the employer may have against the tort-feasor for medical expenses paid by reason of the employee's injuries.³³

Action for amount of award to state officer where no person entitled to compensation. In an action by an insurer to recover from the alleged wrongdoer the amount of awards paid to a state officer, pursuant to the act where there is no person entitled to compensation, a judgment for plaintiff in a prior action by the personal representative of the deceased employee for the latter's death has been regarded as binding on defendant as to the contributory negligence of the deceased employee where the burden of proof as to the defense of contributory negligence is the same in both actions.³⁴

c. Negligence, Wrong, or Estoppel of Employer

Authorities differ as to whether an employer or insurer is barred from recovery against a tort-feasor, for injuries to an employee, by the employer's contributory negligence.

The right of an employer³⁵ or insurer³⁶ to assert rights against a third person has been recognized even where the injury or death of the employee is the result of the joint and concurrent negligence of the employer and the third person. Also, the view

Contributory negligence of fellow employee

has been expressed that the contributory negligence of the employer is not a defense to an action by him³⁷ or his insurer;³⁸ and this is so irrespective of which party commences and maintains the action, as long as the beneficiaries of the compensation award have any real interest in the proceeds of a judgment against the tort-feasor.³⁹

Under some acts, however, an employer who is a joint wrongdoer with the person whom it is sought to hold liable cannot recover compensation paid,⁴⁰ and the defense of the employer's contributory negligence is available to the defendant third person in an action by, or for the benefit of, the employee⁴¹ or insurer.⁴²

§ 1011. Assignment of Cause of Action as Condition Precedent to Award of Compensation

Under a provision that an employee, or his dependents, seeking compensation, shall assign any cause of action against the tort-feasor to the person paying compensation, they are not entitled to compensation in the absence of such assignment.

Under a provision that no compensation shall be granted unless the injured employee or the dependents of a deceased employee shall assign any cause of action against a person responsible for, or causing, the injury to the person paying compensation, an injured employee⁴³ or the dependents of a deceased employee⁴⁴ are not entitled to compensation in the absence of an assignment. The fact that the cause of action is made assignable does not make a cause of action so assigned a liability created by statute;⁴⁵ the only effect of the assignment is to transfer to the assignee the right to maintain the action.⁴⁶

Sufficiency of assignment. The fact that there are inconsistencies in different parts of an assignment as to whom the assignment is intended to run does not necessarily render the assignment a nullity

d. Actions and Proceedings

§ 1012. Nature and Form of Action

Although an action by an employee against a third-person wrongdoer is one in tort and usually regarded as a common-law action, the rights of action acquired by employers or their insurers are statutory and as a general rule are based either in tort for personal injury or death, or on an obligation to reimburse or indemnify such employer or insurer, rather than on an implied contract.

An action by an employee against a person other than the employer is one in tort,⁵² and usually is regarded as a common-law action.⁵³ Although it has been held that the cause of action accruing to an employee and a compensation insurer is single and joint, not severable,⁵⁴ and that the policy of the law is against splitting a cause of action,⁵⁵ the institution of an independent action arising out of incidental matter respecting indemnity and rights of subrogation has been said to be contemplated by the compensation act.⁵⁶

Action by or on behalf of employer or insurer. Rights of actions acquired by or on behalf of an employer or insurer under statutory provisions of the general type here considered are usually regarded as merely the right of action of the injured employee or his dependents against the wrongdoer, transferred to the employer or insurer as discussed supra § 995. Usually the right is not one based on implied contract,⁵⁷ but is an action in tort,⁵⁸ for personal injury or death,⁵⁹ or it may be considered as an action for the recovery of a penalty.⁶⁰

Under some acts, however, the action is not regarded as merely an action for personal injuries but as one based on an obligation imposed on defendant third person by the act to reimburse the employer or insurer for a property injury.⁶¹ In some jurisdictions an employer who has paid compensation to an injured employee has an action ex delicto against the person whose negligence caused the injury under the provision of the compensation act for the subrogation of an employer who has paid compensation to the rights of insurer against the person liable for the injury, and also an action against such person for indemnification, as upon an implied or quasi contract for reimbursement for money which the employer was compelled to pay because of the default of such person.⁶²

Notwithstanding the applicable statute provides for subrogation of the employer or insurer, the right of action is not an equitable one,⁶³ and even where the provision for subrogation is construed not as effecting an assignment to the employer but as the equivalent of a subrogation in equity, as discussed supra § 994, the necessity for bringing an action at law against the third person,⁶⁴ in the name of the employee, as discussed infra § 1017, has been asserted. There is, however, authority for the view that, if the compensation act of one state gives the employer or insurer the right to reimbursement out of a recovery by the injured employee from a third person, a court of equity in another state in which the judgment against the third person is recovered

Particular statutes construed

(1) Where insured employer, which has been reimbursed by workmen's compensation insurer for payment to employee injured by third person's negligence, assigns its claim to insurer, insurer can enforce employer's right of action, which right of action needs no privity of contract with third-party tort-feasor, since it is created by statute.

(2) Since employer's right of action for reimbursement of amount of compensation, paid injured employee under workmen's compensation act, from third person liable to employee for injury, is statutory, requirements of statute must be strictly met.

Mich.—Currier Lumber Co. v. Van Every, 20 N.W.2d 241, 312 Mich. 375.

(3) The form of action which an employer is authorized to maintain under statute vesting him with a cause of action to recover sums paid as compensation as result of injury to, or death of, an employee of a contractor who has not accepted provisions of the compensation act, is assumpsit rather than tort.

may impress a lien on the proceeds of the judgment for the benefit of insurer.⁶⁵

Bringing in third person in action for compensation. Notwithstanding a provision for subrogation of insurer and for the payment to the employee of the excess recovered from the third-person wrongdoer, the view has been taken that insurer may not, in a contested proceeding for compensation brought against it by the injured employee, implead a person who, it is alleged, caused the injury, for the purpose of enforcing insurer's right as subrogee against such person.⁶⁶

§ 1013. Jurisdiction

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, the courts have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine an action by an employee or his representative against a third person.

A provision that, under certain circumstances, if the employee or the dependents of an employee bring an action for the recovery of damages against a person who is subject to the act, other than the employer, the amount thereof, manner in which, and the persons to whom the same are payable, shall be as provided in that part of the act which deals with the award of compensation, does not confer jurisdiction on the industrial commission to determine the amount and manner of payment of the proper award.⁶⁷

Jurisdiction to hear and determine controversies with respect to the rights of an injured employee against a third-person tort-feasor after having recovered compensation from his employer or his insurer, rests with the court rather than with the industrial board or commission.⁶⁸ In an action by an insurer against an employee, who has recovered damages from a third-person tort-feasor, to recover the compensation it had paid such employee, however, the court cannot adjudicate a counterclaim by the employee for additional compensation.⁶⁹

Statutory lien of employer on judgment of employee. A provision that the court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against any judgment of the employee against a person other than the employer the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation confers on the court in which such judgment is rendered the power and duty to fix the amount of the lien⁷⁰ and to allow it as a first lien on the judgment,⁷¹ and by necessary implication denies the existence of such powers and duties in the state industrial accident commission.⁷²

Venue. Under a statute providing that a suit for damages for personal injuries may be brought in the county in which the plaintiff resided at the time of the injury, an insurer, who becomes subrogated to the rights of an injured employee, is not a plaintiff within the meaning of the statute and thus cannot bring a compensation recoupment suit in its own county of residence when the injured employee and his legal representative both lived in another county at the time of the injury.⁷³

73. Tex.—Commercial Standard Ins. Co. v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., Civ. App., 198 S.W.2d 913.

Purpose of statute

Statute providing for suits against railroad corporation for damages arising from personal injuries to be brought either in county in which the injury occurred or in the county in which plaintiff resided at time of injury is a protective statute which guarantees defendant railroad company, in compensation recoupment suit, venue in its home county where the exceptions are not applicable.

surer on the making of payment pursuant to a compensation award.

Under a provision that, if compensation is paid under the act, the employer may enforce for his benefit or for that of the insurance carrier the liability of a person other than the employer, the view has been expressed that a cause of action accrues to the employer whenever he has made a payment in pursuance of the award,⁷⁴ and that the subsequent payments may be sued for and recovered as they become due and payable under the award.⁷⁵ It has been held, under a statute providing that if an employee shall elect to receive compensation the employer or insurer shall be subrogated to the right of the employee against a third-person tort-feasor, that only one action is contemplated,⁷⁶ and it is neither necessary⁷⁷ nor proper⁷⁸ for the employer to bring successive actions for installments of compensation as they become due and are paid; where the award is fixed and made payable in installments extending over a period of years, then damages may be recovered from the person liable⁷⁹ in an amount not exceeding the aggregate amount of compensation payable, without regard to whether or not payment of installments of compensation has actually been made.⁸⁰ In any event, under some provisions, it is not necessary to await the payment of the entire award before proceeding against the person who caused the injury.⁸¹

Assertion of lien. Under a provision that the court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against any judgment of the employee against a person other than the employer the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation, the employer should assert his lien before the verdict or judgment is entered,⁸² or, at least, before satisfaction of the judgment.⁸³

Failure of employer or insurer to sue. Under a provision permitting the employee to sue if employer or insurer does not sue within a specified time after demand, the employee need not await the expiration of the specified period before suing where there is an express waiver by the employer or insurer of the right to sue.⁸⁴

b. Limitations of Actions

- (2) In New York

(1) In General

Where those who come within the provisions of workmen's compensation acts are also entitled to bring actions against third-person tort-feasors, such actions must be commenced within the period of limitation prescribed by statute, and usually the same period of limitation applies in actions by an employer or insurer as is applicable to actions by an employee or his representatives.

Where the employee or his representative may elect to sue a third-person tort-feasor, the action must be instituted within the time limited by statute,⁸⁵ and, where the statute so provides, the failure

Action held not in contract

Where employer's insurance carrier as statutory subrogee of injured workman recovered a judgment against tort-feasor, carrier could not maintain a second action against tort-feasor to recover sums paid in addition to that recovered in the first action under the doctrine of "equitable subrogation" or "conventional subrogation," since the carrier's claim arose out of the employer's liability under the compensation act, and not out of any contract relation between the employee and the carrier.

A two-year period of limitation within which an employee may commence an action against a third-person tort-feasor has been held to be in no way altered by a statute permitting an employer to bring such action if the employee fails to do so within one year and nine months;⁸⁷ and the running of the period is not tolled either by an unconstitutional statute precluding the employee from bringing such an action,⁸⁸ or, since the action is at common law in tort, by a saving clause applicable only to actions arising under the compensation act.⁸⁹ A statute such circumstances that, if death had not ensued, the employee would have been entitled to maintain action against defendant or to recover compensation under employees' compensation act, death action instituted under wrongful death act within one year after appointment of guardian for employee's infant son but more than one year after death was barred by limitation of the death act, notwithstanding employees' compensation act provision that one year limitation on right to compensation for death should not be applicable to infants until appointment of guardian.

Actions in other jurisdictions

An action by an employee injured in Kansas and subject to the Kansas compensation law to recover for injuries against an Ohio third-person tort-feasor not commenced within one year from the date of injury could not be maintained, in view of the Kansas statute assigning the cause of the action to the employee's employer and the Ohio statute providing that actions must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.

Actions held barred

Statute providing that, if some provision of compensation act should be adjudged invalid, period intervening between date of injury and adjudication of invalidity should not be computed as part of time limited by law for commencement of common-law action is applicable only to an action which arises out of some of provisions of the act providing giving an injured workman the right to proceed against a third-person tort-feasor after compensation has been awarded has been held inapplicable where no award has been recovered.⁹⁰

Usually, in an action by or on behalf of an employer or an insurer to enforce the liability of a person who has caused the injury or death of an employee, the statute of limitations is the same as that which would be applicable if the action were brought by the injured employee,⁹¹ or, in case of the death of the employee, by the dependents or the personal representative of the deceased.⁹² Although it has been held that the period of limitation commences to run from the date of the employee's death or injury;⁹³ in some cases, the stat-

Action held barred

Where employer's compensation insurer brought action against third person to recover for wrongful death of workman in name of surviving wife of workman more than eighteen months after death, and it was admitted that insurer was the real party in interest, action was barred by limitations and insurer could not

utes have been construed to effect either a postponement of the accrual of the cause of action until a determination in the compensation proceeding or a suspension of the running of the statute of limitations until such determination.⁹⁴ Where the statute creates a new cause of action in the employer and the insurer, it has been held that the period of limitation applicable to an action based on a liability created by statute applies in an action by an employer or insurer,⁹⁵ or in an action by an employee based on the assignment to him by insurer of the cause of action,⁹⁶ although the right of action in the employee is subject to a shorter period of limitation.⁹⁷ Where an employer is given a statutory right to sue a third-person tort-feasor if the employee fails to do so within a specified time, it has been held that no question of limitation of the employer's right can arise where the employee has already recovered judgment.⁹⁸

Intervention. Where an insurer authorized to bring action has instituted an action prior to the expiration of the period of limitation, the propriety of the filing by an injured employee, who is not a necessary party to the action, of a complaint in intervention which presents no new issue, after the expiration of such period, has been recognized.⁹⁹ So, where an action against a person other than the employer, in the name of an employee, is actually brought for the benefit of the employee and the insurer at the insurer's instance and request and the insurer is therefore a real party in interest, the insurer's right to intervene by petition is not barred although made after the period of limitation has expired where the original action was brought within such period.¹ A statute allowing pleadings to be amended after the period allowed for the commencement of proceedings has expired has been held not to permit an employer to intervene as a plaintiff in an action brought by an employee, and by amendment assert a cause of action against defendant after the period of limitations has expired, since the employer's cause of action is independent and separate.²

Dismissal or nonsuit in action by employee or dependents. Under some acts, where an employee who elects to bring an action against a third person permits a dismissal of the action for default, and the statute of limitations has run before the insurer has knowledge of the dismissal, the insurer loses his right to bring an action against the third person.³ Where, however, after the period of limitation has expired, an insurer who has paid compensation is properly admitted as party plaintiff to an action against a third person by one claiming as widow and sole heir of a deceased employee, the view has been taken that the fact that subsequently there is a judgment of nonsuit as to the widow, from which she does not appeal, does not prevent the insurer's continued prosecution of the action.⁴

Amendment of pleading or record. Where the amended pleadings grow out of the same facts or occurrence as alleged in the original pleading, an employer's complaint is amendable to include the employee as a party plaintiff after the running of the statute of limitations;⁵ but where an amended declaration filed by the employer after the expiration of the period of limitation states a different cause of action from that stated in the original declaration, the action is barred.⁶ Where, after the period of limitation has expired, the insurer is properly admitted as a party plaintiff to an action by one claiming as widow and sole heir of deceased employee and there is subsequently a judgment of nonsuit as to the widow, the insurer may amend the complaint so as to bring in missing heirs, where there is nothing to indicate that the original plaintiff fraudulently omitted to bring in such heirs and the attorneys for both plaintiffs had no knowledge of such heirs until immediately before the amendment was sought.⁷ While an amendment of a notice of motion in an action in the name of the employee to show that the employer is suing in the name of the employee may be appropriate where the employer may maintain an action in the name of the employee, such amendment does not constitute the institution of a new action which will permit the interposition of the plea of the statute of limitations.⁸ In an action by the widow of a deceased employee, the propriety of permitting the amendment of the record, after the statute has run, to show that the action is for the benefit of the widow and of the employer who is entitled to subrogation under the act has been recognized.⁹

Provision fixing time for filing compensation claim. Statutes providing that the right to compensation shall be barred unless a claim is filed within a specified time after the date of the employee's death or injury have been held inapplicable in actions against third persons.¹⁰

Provision permitting action by employee or dependents on failure of employer or insurer to sue. Statutes providing that if an employer or insurer who is entitled to enforce the liability of a person other than the employer shall not within a specified time start proceedings to enforce such liability, the injured employee or, in case of death, his dependents, may enforce the liability of such other person, have been held to,¹¹ and have been held not to,¹² restrict to such specified period the employer's or insurer's right to bring an action.

In Louisiana, where the view is taken that the employer has two causes of action, as discussed supra § 1012, the statute of limitations applicable if the employee had sued for the wrong applies where the employer seeks to enforce rights acquired under the subrogation provision of the act,¹³ but the statute applicable to the action for indemnity, independent of the act, is that which is applicable to actions on implied contracts.¹⁴

Marquette Cas. Co. v. Brown, App., 97 So.2d 92.

(2) In New York

Where an injured employee or, in case of death, his dependents take compensation and desire to bring an action against a third-person tort-feasor, such action must be commenced within the time allowed by statute or the cause of action is assigned to the party liable for compensation who thereafter has the exclusive right to maintain such action.

In New York, although an injured employee normally may bring an action against a negligent third person at any time within the period allowed in negligence actions generally,¹⁵ under a statute so providing, where an employee or, in case of death, his dependents take compensation and desire to bring such an action, it must be commenced not later than six months after the awarding of compensation,¹⁶ or not later than nine months after the enactment of a law creating, establishing, or affording a new or additional remedy,¹⁷ and in any event before the expiration of one year from the date such action accrues,¹⁸ or the cause of action is assigned to the party liable for compensation who thereafter has the exclusive right to maintain such action.

The action must be commenced against the third party, or against a codefendant united in interest therewith, within the time prescribed,¹⁹ and, if not

Federal Tort Claims Act

Under amendment extending period within which to institute a third-party action to nine months after passage of a law creating new or additional remedies, nine months after effective date of Federal Tort Claims Act was the last date on which injured longshoreman could institute suit against United States as third-party tort-feasor for injuries for which longshoreman had been awarded and paid compensation; and a waiver by employer's insurance carrier of right of subrogation did not extend the time for commencement of action, particularly where waiver was executed almost three years after commencement of action by employee.

Construction

(1) The statute directing that a third-party action must be commenced within one year from date of injury, if injured employee takes or intends to take compensation is unambiguous and does not require construction.

N.Y.—Crossman v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, 48 N.Y.S.2d 701, reversed on other grounds 50 N.Y.S.2d 785, 268 App.Div. 875, affirmed 60 N.E.2d 199, 294 N.Y. 39.

(2) The provision in the workmen's compensation law that if an injured employee takes compensation and desires to bring an action against a third party whose negligence caused the injury, the action must be commenced not later than six months after awarding of compensation, and in any event before expiration of one year from date such cause of action accrues, is plain, and the words employed ordinary, and they must be given their usual meaning.

N.Y.—Carter v. Brooklyn Ladder Co., 25 N.Y.S.2d 639, 175 Misc. 920, affirmed 37 N.Y.S.2d 578, 265 App. Div. 39.

(3) An injured workman, who has accepted compensation, does not have a choice of commencing action within six months of awarding of compensation "or" before expiration of one year from date action accrues. N.Y.—Duffy v. Thames Trading Co., 66 N.Y.S.2d 579.

Nondependent beneficiary

Provisions of the act requiring action against tort-feasor to be instituted within six months after receiving the award, or within one year from the date action accrued, does not bar the action by the nondependent beneficiary where there is no identity in the constituency of the dependent and next-of-kin group, but where the dependent is the sole beneficiary of the deceased employee's estate, or is sole next of kin, the compensation act limitation provision would apply.

Service or delivery of process as commencement

(1) Where federal jurisdiction of suit for wrongful death was predicated on diversity of citizenship, suit was deemed to have been commenced on date of service upon defendant for purpose of determining whether it was commenced within time allowed compensation claimant to pursue his remedy against third-party tort-feasor.

U.S.—Werkley v. Koninklijke Luchtvaart Maatschappij N. V., D.C.N.Y., 111 F.Supp. 300.

(2) The limitation period prescribed by the workmen's compensation law on an action by an employee covered by the law against a third-party tort-feasor was not extended by delivery of process to the sheriff within the statutory period and its service after the expiration thereof, since the time limitation of the compensation law, and not that prescribed by the civil practice act was applicable.

(3) Provision in statute authorizing service of summons upon nonresident motorist by serving secretary of state that such service should be complete in ten days after papers are filed, is a matter of grace to allow actual notice to be brought to a nonresident motorist before beginning of a twenty-day period also commenced, the third party may assert as a defense that the employee no longer holds the cause of action.²⁰ The fact that the assignee may not

lowed defendant to answer, and does not operate to shorten six-month period within which employee taking compensation for injuries received in collision with such nonresident may bring action against the nonresident before his action becomes assigned by law to state for benefit of state insurance fund; and the action commenced when service of summons was made on the secretary of state as motorist's statutory attorney for service of summons.

N.Y.—Cooper v. Amehler, 35 N.Y.S. 2d 917, 178 Misc. 844.

Action against another held sufficient

(1) Commencement of third-party action against employer of third party was sufficient to defeat motion of third party to dismiss complaint even though third party had not been served within time required by the workmen's compensation law, since third party and his employer were so united in interest that commencement of action against employer was sufficient to toll statute against third party.

N.Y.—Plumitallo v. 1407 Broadway Realty Corp., 111 N.Y.S.2d 720, 279 App.Div. 1019.

(2) Service of summons within year on allegedly negligent third party was sufficient to prevent assignment of cause of action against such third party's employer, a codefendant, since defendants were united in interest within statutory provision that action is commenced when summons is served on codefendant united in interest.

N.Y.—Hatch v. Cherry-Burrell Corp., 82 N.Y.S.2d 322, 274 App.Div. 234, appeal denied 83 N.Y.S.2d 219, 274 App.Div. 869.

(3) Transferee of corporation's assets, which had agreed to pay corporation's debts, was "united in interest" with such corporation as defendant in third-party action by contractor's employee for injuries sustained on corporation's premises, within terms of rule that action is commenced by service on codefendant united in interest, and hence service of summons on transferee within statutory time was sufficient to prevent cause of action against corporation from being assigned to contractor by operation of law, and employee remained real party in interest.

N.Y.—Cappello v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 103 N.Y.S.2d 157, 200 Misc. 924.

Action against another held insufficient

(1) Corporation could defend against third-party action by employee on ground that action was not commenced within six months after award of compensation, notwithstanding employee within the required six-month period had commenced a third-party action against another corporation which allegedly owned premises where accident occurred.

N.Y.—Reyes v. Federal Adhesives Corp., 96 N.Y.S.2d 510.

(2) Timely commencement of action against third-party tortfeasor for negligence resulting in injuries to employee of another did not entitle injured employee's administratrix after employee's death to commence similar action against other tortfeasors more than six months after injured employee had accepted compensation award.

N.Y.—Jacoby v. Chemical Bank & Trust Co., 69 N.Y.S.2d 371.

(3) Where compensation claimant was injured as result of several negligence of defendants, who were not joint contractors or otherwise united in interest, and claimant failed to sue one defendant within one year after injury, action against defendant not sued was barred by limitation.

Impleader

Injured employee choosing to take compensation who brought third-party action against owner of premises at which he was injured within time required by statute, could not after lapse of statutory period, implead cleaning contractor who was responsible for waxing hallway wherein employee fell, since any action that injured employee might have had against cleaning contractor, was automatically assigned by operation of law to employer or his insurance carrier upon lapse of the statutory period.

N.Y.—Eisenberg v. Louis Adler Realty Co., 86 N.E.2d 102, 299 N.Y. 572.

Amendment

Where compensation claimant's third-party action against one of two defendants whose several negligence caused injury was timely, bar of one-year limitation as to other defendant could not be lifted by bringing in other defendant by amendment after expiration of one year from date of injury.

Motion to dismiss

Defendant's motion to dismiss injured workman's action against third-party tort-feasor on ground that workman's cause of action had been assigned to employer's insurance carrier by workman's acceptance of compensation payments and failure to bring third-party action within six months thereafter or within one year from time cause of action accrued would be denied where third-party tort-feasor was in a position to know of expiration of six-month and one-year periods and failed to set defense up in its original answer, and at time motion to amend defense was made three-year statute of limitations applicable to negligence actions generally had expired.

N.Y.—Forsyth v. Manufacturers Trust Co., 104 N.Y.S.2d 571, affirmed 105 N.Y.S.2d 358, 278 App. Div. 848.

Motion to amend answer

(1) Motion for leave to amend answer, by interposing defense that plaintiff's cause of action has been automatically assigned to the compensation carrier, because of failure to timely commence the action should have been granted, where no prejudice to the carrier would result. N.Y.—Lehman v. Hartke, 146 N.Y.S. 2d 444, 286 App. Div. 661.

(2) Defendants, moving nearly six years after commencement of personal injury action for leave to amend answers by adding allegations that action was barred because of failure to commence it within six months after first workmen's compensation award to plaintiff, were chargeable with laches barring such amendments.

N.Y.—Morey v. City of Rochester, 85 N.Y.S.2d 32, 274 App. Div. 969.

(3) Where action was begun against original third parties within the statutory period required by provision relating to third-party actions by injured employees, an additional third party who was subsequently brought into the action was properly denied permission to amend answer by inserting therein an additional defense alleging that plaintiff had failed to bring action against additional third party within such statutory period.

N.Y.—Oldford v. Moran Towing Corp., 60 N.Y.S.2d 52, 270 App. Div. 822.

(4) Since statutes enlarging time within which actions could be brought by employees covered by workmen's compensation law against tort-feasors should not be construed liberally so as to encompass pending cases, a motion to amend answer will be granted.

Duffy v. Thames Trading Co., 66 N.Y.S.2d 579.

Purpose of limitation

(1) Purpose of compensation law provision requiring that action against third-party tort-feasor be commenced within six months of compensation award, and in any event within one year from time cause of action accrued, is to foreclose double recovery for same injury.

N.Y.—Baselice v. Fanoni, 57 N.Y.S. 2d 531, 185 Misc. 593.

(2) Limitation provision of workmen's compensation law was not intended to shorten the three-year limitation for actions arising out of negligence contained in the civil practice act, but was intended to define who, within that period, should be entitled to bring the negligence action against the negligent third party.

N.Y.—Grossman v. Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, 50 N.Y.S.2d 785, 268 App. Div. 875, affirmed 60 N.E.2d 199, 294 N.Y. 39.

Necessity of formal award

(1) The fixation of liability on part of employer by the industrial board, and the granting of some compensation after such fixation, is an "awarding of compensation" within statute.

N.Y.—Carter v. Brooklyn Ladder Co., 37 N.Y.S.2d 573, 265 App. Div. 39.

(2) The six-month period did not begin to run on mere receipt of advance compensation payments in anticipation of a subsequent award of compensation, but only on a formal award of compensation.

N.Y.—Moses v. Contower Realty Corp., 63 N.Y.S.2d 889.

(3) The provision that employee, injured by negligence of another not in same employ, may sue such other for damages within six months after award of compensation, refers to compensation award, not receipt of temporary compensation payments, and application, made by injured employee within six months after date of such award, for leave to file claim against state, is timely, even though not made within six months after receipt of last compensation payment.

N.Y.—Young v. State, 74 N.Y.S.2d 811, 190 Misc. 711, reversed on other grounds 78 N.Y.S.2d 39, 278 App. Div. 986.

Validity of award

Where compensation award was made as result of claim erroneously processed by painter against apartment house owner as employer, but subsequently a corrected award was made against separate corporation which was his true employer, employee's third-party negligence action against apartment house owner commenced within six months after the date of the corrected award was not barred.

N.Y.—Brunn v. Tip Realty Corp., 112 N.Y.S.2d 183.

Actions for injuries not included in award

(1) In employee's action against employer's physician for malpractice, physician was not entitled to commenced more than a year after the cause of action accrued, but before the taking of compensation, is not barred.²⁵

Although it has been held that the period of limitation commences to run when the first award of compensation is made,²⁶ it has also been held that the statutory provisions relating to the period of limitation must be liberally construed and read in conjunction with other provisions of the statute which require the board to give notice of an award to the parties involved,²⁷ and that the running of the period begins with the giving of notice of an award rather than with the act of making an award.²⁸

Infants or incompetents. Even where there has been an award of compensation, the statutory limitations as to time have been held not to run against a person who is mentally incompetent, or a minor, as long as no committee or guardian has been appointed.²⁹ Thus, with respect to an infant, the period of limitation has been held not to begin running until the appointment of a guardian³⁰ or until the infant reaches majority.³¹

§ 1015. Parties

An injured employee, or, in case of his death, the personal representative or dependents of the employee, who under the compensation act have a beneficial interest in the amount recovered from a third person wrongdoer, may bring an action to recover from the wrongdoer; but some acts do not contemplate an action by dependents of an employee who have obtained an award.

Notwithstanding the employer is entitled to subrogation under the workmen's compensation act, an injured employee,³² or, in case of the death of the summary judgment because employee had accepted compensation payments from employer's insurance carrier, where there was question of fact as to whether payments were for damages for result of original injury only or whether they also included damages for alleged malpractice.

N.Y.—Weinman v. Schmidt, 66 N.Y. S.2d 45, 271 App.Div. 843.

(2) Defendant in action for alleged malpractice in treatment of injury covered by workmen's compensation law may not take advantage of time limitation under statute providing that failure to commence action within time limited operates as assignment of cause of action to person liable for compensation until it is shown that plaintiff has taken and accepted compensation for aggravation of his injuries resulting from the alleged malpractice.

N.Y.—McIntyre v. Stewart, 55 N.Y. S.2d 39, 184 Misc. 610, affirmed 55 N.Y.S.2d 128, 269 App.Div. 731.

(3) Although the statutory provision requiring that action against third-party tort-feasor be commenced within six months after award of compensation, or in any event within one year from date cause of action accrued, applies to suits for malpractice, where the compensation award did not embrace aggravation of injury allegedly caused by defendant's malpractice, limitation provisions of compensation law respecting action against third-party tort-feasor did not apply to malpractice action so as to require dismissal for failure to bring action within time limited.

N.Y.—Baselice v. Fanoni, 57 N.Y.S. 2d 531, 185 Misc. 593.

(4) Where mother and sole next of kin of decedent killed in airplane crash in a foreign country elected to take compensation under New York law, her failure to commence suit against airline for decedent's death within six months after compensation award resulted in an automatic statutory assignment to compensation insurer of that part of her cause of action demanding indemnity for airline's negligence in causing death, but not of that part of her cause of action dealing with "moral damages," which were unknown in New York; and the insurer, having only a partial assignment, could not cause splitting of cause of action by suing on its assignment, but entire cause of action remained in hands of decedent's estate for benefit of mother.

employee, the personal representative or dependents of such employee,³³ who under the act, have, or may have, a beneficial interest in the amount recovered from the third person wrongdoer, may bring an action against the wrongdoer, and it has been held that the injured employee, as the real party in interest, may bring the action in his own name.³⁴ The rule is otherwise where, under the provision involved, compensation is received and the personal representative has no cause of action against the wrongdoer for the death of an employee.³⁵ Notwithstanding a provision for subrogation of the employer to the rights of dependents of a deceased employee, it has been held that the personal representative, and not the employer, is the

A statute providing that an employee, or his dependents in case of his death, may proceed against a third-person tort-feasor if the employer or insurer does not commence an action within a stated time from the award is for the benefit of the employer or insurer and the injured employee or his dependents, and it is not for the benefit of the tort-

Sole party in interest

No right in dependent mother

Workmen's compensation statute providing that employee's dependents may pursue his remedy by action at law or otherwise against third-person tort-feasor did not grant special concession irrespective of statute providing that action for death shall be brought by widow and where there is neither widow nor minor child by any person dependent on person killed, and where surviving widow dismissed action against alleged tort-feasor, dependent mother did not succeed to right to sue.

feasor.³⁸ A rule that compensation act provisions relating to third-person tort-feasors are not intended to relieve such a wrongdoer of liability will not be applied to prevent an alleged tort-feasor from ascertaining who is the real plaintiff in an action against wrongdoer.³⁹

Where the act provides that, if compensation is paid, the insurer may enforce in the name of the employee or in its own name and for its own benefit the liability of a person other than the employer, the view has been taken that, as in the ordinary case of an action at law brought in the name of an assignor of a cause of action, it is immaterial whether plaintiff employee is the real party in interest or is a nominal party suing for the benefit of another;⁴⁰ and a like rule has been recognized in respect of the status of the personal representative of a deceased employee.⁴¹ An agreement of plaintiff employee not to sue the employer in consideration of receiving an amount equal to that called for by the workmen's compensation act, and to repay the employer's insurer from the amount recovered from defendant, does not make the employer's insurer a real party in interest as to the action against defendant.⁴²

An employee is under no duty to prosecute an action against a negligent third person for the benefit of his employer's insurance carrier, at least where the employee has never claimed or been awarded compensation or medical expenses;⁴³ but where an employee, seeking damages for personal injuries from an alleged wrongdoer, is paid compensation by his employer's insurer, the employee is not the real party in interest within a statute requiring an action to be brought by such a party.⁴⁴ It has been stated, however, that the act does not vest absolutely in an injured employee a cause of action for medical expenses which are not paid by him, or for moneys already paid as compensation, but it gives the employee the right to sue the third person for both of such claims, in a sort of a representative or trust capacity.⁴⁵ Until an injured employee assigns to his employer, either actually or equitably, his right of action against a tort-feasor, the injured employee is the real party in interest under some compensation acts.⁴⁶

Under some acts it has been implied that the action against a negligent third person is prosecuted in behalf of any person entitled to claim a share in the recovery, regardless of whether he is a party to the action.⁴⁷

Under the Federal Workmen's Compensation Act, the United States has no right of action in the absence of an assignment by the employee of his right of action, but the commission may require an employee to assign his right of action to the United States or to prosecute an action in his own name as a condition of receiving compensation.⁴⁸ It has been held that the legal representative of an employee of the United States is the proper party to sue for the death of the employee notwithstanding compensation has been paid under the Federal Workmen's Compensation Act where an assignment to the United States of the cause of action against the third person wrongdoer was neither made nor required by the compensation commission.⁴⁹ So it has been held that a soldier of the United States army who had received compensation under the War Risk Insurance Act was entitled to maintain an action in his own name, as a real party in interest, against a negligent third person.⁵⁰

What constitutes joinder. Granting to insurer a lien on the judgment recovered by the personal representative of a deceased employee, pursuant to a provision of a compensation act, does not amount to a joinder of insurer with the personal representative in recovering judgment;⁵¹ but an employer having paid workmen's compensation to an injured em-

Real party in interest

(1) Where an employer paid compensation to an employee allegedly injured by a third party not under the act, and sought to recover against the third party the amount of compensation paid to the employee for the benefit of the employer's compensation insurer, the employer was the real party in interest notwithstanding the phrase "for the use" of the insurer since such words did not affect rights which the employer had against the third party.

Ill.—Melohn v. Ganley, 100 N.E.2d 780, 344 Ill.App. 316.

(2) An action to recover a sum paid by contractor in satisfaction of an award for funeral expenses of deceased employee of subcontractor who had not accepted provisions of the compensation act was properly brought under the express provisions of the workmen's compensation act, and was unaffected by general provision of the judicature act requiring suits to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, notwithstanding sum was paid by contractor's insurance carrier.

Mich.—Michigan Boiler & Sheet Iron Works, for Use and Benefit of American Mut. Liability Co. v. Dressler, 282 N.W. 223, 286 Mich. 502.

(3) Under section of workmen's compensation act governing suits to enforce liability of third-person tort-feasor, employer had sufficient interest to prosecute action as "real party in interest" three years after injury, and failure to bring suit in name of employee's widow or personal representative was not fatal.

Mich.—Muskegon Hardware & Supply Co. for Use and Benefit of Hardware Mut. Cas. Co. v. Green, 72 N.W.2d 52, 343 Mich. 340.

(4) Under compensation act, an injured employee electing to receive compensation does not retain right to participate as plaintiff in an action which by the act has been assigned to his employer to recover from third person causing injury and therefore motion to have injured employees dropped as parties plaintiff was granted, since they were not "real parties at interest" within meaning of federal rules.

the employee has been recognized, but under some acts the right is subject to certain limitations.⁵⁷ Some acts expressly permit the employer or insurer to proceed either in his or its own or in the name of the employee, as discussed infra § 1017.

Where the act provides that, if compensation is claimed and awarded, any employer may enforce for the benefit of the insurer the liability of a third person, the fact that the action is in the name of the employer for the benefit of the insurer and of the injured employee, if not in strict compliance with the act, has been considered immaterial where the act expressly directs the application of the amount recoverable.⁵⁸ A statute authorizing an employer or his insurer to proceed legally against a third person causing injuries to the employee who has received compensation but who has not brought suit within a stated time from the injuries, and which does not expressly confer a right on the employer or his insurer to institute suit in his or its own name, should not be construed to imply such right, since the statute is in derogation of the common law and must be strictly construed.⁵⁹

Plaintiff as trustee. Where under the act either the employer or the employee may sue and both the employer and the employee or the employee's dependents have a beneficial interest in the recovery, the employer who sues does so, in part at least, as the trustee of an express trust,⁶⁰ to see that the employee receives any surplus after his indemnification.⁶¹

57. Longshoremen's Compensation Act

(1) Under Longshoremen's Compensation Act providing that acceptance of compensation operates as assignment to employer of employee's cause of action against third-person tort-feasor, employer is thereby constituted trustee of express trust and hence is real party in interest exclusively vested with right of action, and although insurer paying compensation has beneficial interest in recovery, insurer cannot maintain action as subrogee against tort-feasor.

N.Y.—Globe Indemnity Co. v. Atlantic Lighterage Corporation, 278 N.Y.S. 212, 244 App.Div. 97, affirmed 2 N.E.2d 640, 271 N.Y. 234.

(2) If insurer could maintain action in its own right to recover from third person amount of its expenditures, there inevitably would result a division of cause of action between insurer seeking to be indemnified and employer in whom would remain vested a cause of action for excess payable to injured employee. A rule which would thus subject third person to two actions on a cause of action which is single and entire would be fruitful of unjust results. Moreover, it would be incompatible with the principle that the equity of subrogation does not arise in favor of a surety or indemnitor until the entire obligation has been discharged. If, on the other hand, insurer were permitted to sue not only for actual expenditures, but for any excess to which injured employee might be entitled, it would violate basic principle that insurer may not maintain action in his own right where there is an outstanding interest in another because right of subrogation entitles him only to indemnity.

N.Y.—Globe Indemnity Co. v. Atlantic Lighterage Corporation, supra.

(3) Payment of death compensation under Longshoremen's Compensation Act does not entitle employer to sue the tort-feasor in his own name under the wrongful death act unless all entitled to benefits of death act received compensation, and where right of dependents to which employer is subrogated under compensation act is only to a share of proceeds of recovery, employer acquires only right of dependent to compel representative of decedent, by appropriate proceedings, to maintain suit and to have share in proceeds of recovery against the tort-feasor.

Under New York statute

(1) Where injured workman collected compensation from compensation insurer, so as to subrogate insurer to workman's rights against person responsible for injury, statutory right which workman would have had to file a claim against insolvent liability insurer of person liable for injury did not inure to benefit of compensation insurer, whether liability insurer was solvent or insolvent.

(2) Commissioners of state insurance fund, being by statute managers and administrators of the fund, were proper parties plaintiff to maintain action for damages allegedly caused by negligence of defendants to employee of an employer whose liability to employees was insured by fund, where compensation was awarded employee and he did not commence an action against defendants within time limited by workmen's compensation law.

N.Y.—Commissioners of State Ins. Fund v. Gladstone, 61 N.Y.S.2d 792, 186 Misc. 91.

(3) The workmen's compensation statutes giving employer cause of action against third-person tort-feasor for medical expenses paid on behalf of injured employee, and giving employee right of action against third-person tort-feasor for such expenses, when read together, are not inconsistent but provide compensation benefits, including medical care, for employee whether or not he succeeds in action or even brings one.

N.Y.—Calhoun v. West End Brewing Co., 56 N.Y.S.2d 105, 269 App.Div. 398.

(4) Where employee had not claimed or been awarded compensation for injuries arising out of, and in course of, employment and in an action for such injuries against negligent third person had recovered nothing for medical expense because he had incurred no such expense, employer and employer's insurance carrier had a separate cause of action against the negligent third person.

Assignment

(1) Under federal compensation act provision that, if death is caused under circumstances creating legal liability on some person other than United States, the United States employees' compensation commission may require beneficiary to assign to United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability, or may require beneficiary to prosecute action in his own name, where commission has not acted in the matter, beneficiary may prosecute the action, but any recovery is applied or credited to make the United States whole with respect to compensation paid or payable.

Minn.—Wagner v. City of Duluth, 300 N.W. 320, 211 Minn. 252.

(2) Under workmen's compensation act, failure of workman to bring action against third person liable for his injury, within time specified by act, operates as an assignment to workman's employer of any cause of action in tort which he may have against such third person, and employer may enforce it by proper action in any court of competent jurisdiction, in his own name or in name of workman for their benefit as their interests may appear.

Kan.—Terrell v. Ready Mixed Concrete Co. of Kansas City, Kan., 258 P.2d 275, 174 Kan. 633.

Limited subrogation at option of employee

Amendment of workmen's compensation act so as to permit injured employee to claim compensation benefits and at the same time institute suit against third-person tort-feasor in name of injured employee as plaintiff, or at employee's option, in the name of employee and for use and benefit of employer or insurance carrier gives injured employee the right to control his own lawsuit against third-person and provides for limited subrogation on an equitable basis.

Fla.—Fidelity & Cas. Co. of N. Y. v. Beddingfield, 60 So.2d 489.

Compensation accepted by employee

Where an injured employee accepted compensation under the compensation act, he could not maintain an action against a third-person within six months from the date of injury in his own name in the absence of an allegation in the complaint disclosing that the action was instituted in the name of employee by either his employer or his employer's insurance carrier.

N.C.—Taylor v. Hunt, 95 S.E.2d 589, 245 N.C. 212.

In Illinois

(1) Where compensation had been awarded for death of employee, caused by negligence of third person who also was under compensation act, employer had no right of recovery against third person in name of employee's personal representative for amount of compensation paid.

Ill.—Havana Nat. Bank, for Use of Hartford Acc. & Indem. Co. v. Tazewell Club, 19 N.E.2d 228, 298 Ill.App. 393.

(2) Action by decedent's widow and daughter to recover under dram shop act because of decedent's death, for which workmen's compensation had been paid, was not an action by the employee or his personal representative, within statute providing for an employer's participation in a proceeding on a claim for damages by reason of injury or death for which compensation has been paid; "personal representative" means the administrator or executor, or other official representative, of a deceased surer⁶⁸ to proceed either in his or its own name or in the name of the employee, or jointly,⁶⁹ against a third-person tort-feasor. Such an act does not create a new cause of action but merely authorizes the employer or his insurance carrier in his or its own name or in the name of the injured employee to institute or join in and prosecute the injured employee's cause of action for the benefit of all.⁷⁰ Even in the absence of an express provision permitting the prosecution of an action against a third person in the name of the injured employee,⁷¹ or of the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee,⁷² the right to prosecute the action in such name for the benefit of the employer or insurer has been recognized.

The view has been taken, however, that under a provision that the employer, having paid compensation or having become liable therefor, shall be subrogated to the rights of the injured employee or of his dependents to recover damages against a third person and may recover in his own name or that of "the injured employee" from such third person, the indemnity paid or payable to the injured employee, or the conservator or guardian of an incompetent or minor employee.

71 C.J. p 1580 note 37.

One of the purposes of the statute, whereby both compensation insurer and injured employee have an interest in any action brought against third-person tort-feasor, was to impose ultimate liability for an injury to the employee upon a person other than the insured legally at fault. Mass.—Dreher v. Bedford Realty, Inc., 140 N.E.2d 180.

Benefit of insurer

In administratrix' action to recover damages for employee's death from another than employer, where complaint alleged that action was brought for benefit of employer's workman's compensation insurer, which paid award of compensation under workmen's compensation act and which was joined and appeared as party plaintiff, action may be continued as brought for benefit of insurer primarily and also for benefit of employee's widow and children, who may participate in any recovery exceeding amount of award.

S.C.—Fuller v. Southern Elec. Service Co., 20 S.E.2d 707, 200 S.C. 246.

Failure to bring action

(1) Where workman failed to file tort action against third-person tort-feasor within one year from injury and employer likewise failed to bring such action, employer's compensation insurer was entitled to do so in his own name or in the name of the workman for their benefit as their interests might appear prior to expiration of statute of limitations.

Kan.—Wise v. Morgan-Mack Motor Co., 246 P.2d 308, 173 Kan. 372.

(2) Widow having failed to institute action against third-person tort-feasor for death of husband, employer's compensation insurer having assumed liability for compensation awarded widow could maintain such action in widow's name, since provisions in workmen's compensation act authorizing employer to maintain such action in name of injured employee or dependents or personal representatives of deceased employee create an exception to general rule of code of civil procedure that every action must be prosecuted in name of real party in interest and are to be given full effect notwithstanding such code provision.

D.C.—Tate v. Nelson, D.C., 71 F.Supp. 465.

Nominal party

Under provisions of workmen's compensation statute subrogating employer or insurance carrier, in case either has paid compensation award, to claim of employee against third person, employer or insurance carrier need not be a nominal party to an action brought by employee, or employee's administratrix in case of death, against third person.

§ 1018. — Action in Name of State

An action in the name of a state against a third-person tort-feasor may be brought where the act provides for the transfer of the cause of action to the state for the benefit of the accident fund.

Where the act provides for the transfer to the state for the benefit of the accident fund the cause of action against a person not in the same employ, the propriety of prosecuting an action in the name of the state against a third person has been recognized.⁷⁸ Notwithstanding a provision of the statute creating a right of action for death by wrongful act that the action shall be brought by and in the name of the state for the use of the persons entitled to damages, it has been held or recognized that it is not essential that an action for the benefit of the dependents of a deceased employee and of an insurer who has paid compensation and thereby has acquired the right to proceed against a third person should be brought in the name of the state,⁷⁹ but where the insurer is the state accident fund, it has been held that it is proper that the action against the third person should be brought in the name of the state.⁸⁰ In an action by a workman or his dependents against a third-person tort-feasor, it has been held that a court will not consider reasons why the workmen's compensation bureau has not brought the action in the bureau's own name.⁸¹

§ 1019. — Proper and Necessary Parties

- a. Employee, or personal representative or dependents of deceased employee
- b. Employer or insurer

a. Employee, or Personal Representative or Dependents of Deceased Employee

Under some workmen's compensation acts, although a person who has elected to take compensation may have a beneficial interest in the amount recovered from a third-person wrongdoer, such person is not a proper party to an action by the employer; under other acts the employee or the dependents of a deceased employee have been regarded as proper but not necessary parties where he or they have an interest in the recovery.

Under some acts, the view has been taken that, even though the person who has elected to take compensation may have a beneficial interest in the amount recovered from the third-person wrongdoer, such person is not a proper party to an action by the employer.⁸² Under other acts providing for

An injured employee who has been paid compensation has been held not to be a proper or necessary party plaintiff in an insurer's action against a third-person tort-feasor,⁸⁸ at least where the action is not commenced within the statutory time after the accident has occurred or compensation was paid.⁸⁹ In an action by an injured employee against a third-person tort-feasor, another person who may possibly be liable may properly be impleaded, since the injured employee has but a single claim for damages for the injuries which he sustained in the accident.⁹⁰

expenses of medical services rendered to an injured employee, based on a conventional assignment and subrogation made by the employer to the insurer, the employee who has compromised his right of action against the third person is not a necessary party.⁹¹

b. Employer or Insurer

An employer paying compensation is a necessary party under some acts to an action by an employee or the personal representative of a deceased employee against a third-person tort-feasor whose alleged negligence caused the injury or death of the employee; under other acts neither the employer nor the insurer who pays compensation is a necessary party to the action.

Notwithstanding the act permits an injured employee both to receive compensation and to proceed against a third person for damages, where the employer is entitled to indemnity or subrogation in respect of compensation paid, in an action by the employee the employer should, it has been asserted, be brought in in some way in order that he may obtain indemnification.⁹² Thus an employer paying compensation is a necessary party under some acts,⁹³ and he must be made a party.⁹⁴

Under a provision that the employer shall be subrogated to the right of the employee or dependents against a third person, the propriety of making the employer a party to an action against the third person has been recognized even though the compensation has been paid by insurer,⁹⁵ as has the right of the employee or dependents to make the employer or insurer who has, or may have, an interest in the recovery, a party defendant.⁹⁶ On the other hand, under some acts, when the insurer has made payments to the employee, the insurer, and not the employer, has a right of action as the party subrogated so that the employer is not a proper party plaintiff to an action against a third person.⁹⁷

Notwithstanding the compensation act gives the employer or insurer an interest in the recovery from, or claim against, a third person, the view has been taken that neither the employer⁹⁸ nor the insurer

Legal liability

To entitle an employer to participate in a proceeding on a claim for damages by reason of an injury or death for which compensation has been paid, there must be legal liability for damages on part of third person, the complaint must state a good common-law cause of action and the proof must establish a good common-law or statutory right of recovery of damage for negligence or wrongful death, and the negligence of the third person must be the proximate cause of the injury or death.

Indispensable party

In suit for declaratory relief on ground that plaintiff had become liable for and had paid workmen's compensation to an employee allegedly injured through defendant's negligence based on a common-law right of indemnity, absence of insurance company actually paying compensation as a party to the suit was no defense, since subsequent development during trial that compensation payments were actually made by the insurer could be considered a transfer of interest by the plaintiff under the statute during the pendency of the action specifically authorizing continuance thereof in the name of the assignor; but insurer was an indispensable party to the recovery phase of the proceeding so that employer was not entitled to recover of the defendant where the employer had paid nothing but the payments had been made by the insurance carrier which was not a party to the suit.

Agreement of parties

In action against truck owners for injuries received by traveling salesman when truck sideswiped salesman's automobile, for which salesman had received compensation under the workmen's compensation act, the employer and the employer's insurer were not necessary parties to the action where agreement between employer, employer's insurer, and salesman authorized salesman to prosecute action in his own name, since, in view of agreement, judgment would constitute a complete who pays compensation⁹⁹ is a necessary party to an action by the employee or the personal representative of a deceased employee against a third person whose negligence caused the injury or death of the employee. Where the right of an employer to relief against a third person is dependent on his being a self-insurer, an employer who is not a self-insurer is neither a necessary,¹ nor, it seems, a proper,² party to an action to enforce the liability of the person who, it is alleged, caused the injury. It has been asserted that, notwithstanding the employer and insurer are primarily the beneficiaries of the action against a third person, the employer or insurer is neither a necessary³ nor even a proper⁴

Under provisions that the acceptance of compensation shall operate as an assignment to the employer of the right of the person entitled to compensation to proceed against the person causing the injury and that out of the amount recovered the employer shall pay to the employee or to the representative the excess over expenses, benefits furnished by the employer, and compensation paid and payable, the employer is the only necessary party plaintiff in an action against a third person for injury to, or the wrongful death of, an employee where the employer has paid compensation.⁵ Where an insurance carrier, as a third-party as-bar to any further suit based on the same cause of action, which was the only question of importance concerning defendant.

Joint tort-feasors' contribution act

In action by employee of corporation which had contracted to furnish material and labor necessary to construct electric transmission wires for defendant, for injuries received when he contacted live wire, plaintiff's employer was not a proper party defendant, even under joint tort-feasors' contribution act, where employer carried insurance pursuant to workmen's compensation law and had paid all compensation due to plaintiff under that act.

No subrogation under statute

Action for death occasioned by negligence in Colorado was properly brought in name of decedent's widow, although decedent was employed in Wyoming under whose statute such cause of action would inure to decedent's personal representative, but under applicable Wyoming statute, which does not provide for subrogation, Wyoming industrial accident fund, from which widow received compensation for husband's death, was not a necessary party to action and could only look to proceeds of judgment in hands of widow for reimbursement for compensation paid.

In action for death of plaintiff's intestate, complaint alleging negligence of municipality in failing to keep its streets in repair causing death of intestate in sewer drain which he was excavating, and alleging that intestate was working with Emergency Relief Administration which was alleged to be an independent contractor failed to state cause of action where independent contractor was not made party to the action and it was not shown that independent contractor could be sued.

Other persons

Provision in longshoremen's compensation act that acceptance of compensation shall operate as an assignment of right to recover damages against third person gives employer or insurance carrier right to maintain action for wrongful death against a third person where the person who elects to receive compensation is the sole person for whose benefit such action for wrongful death may be brought, but not where there are persons other than the person who elects to take compensation for whose benefit action for wrongful death may be maintained.

D.C.—Tate v. Nelson, D.C., 71 F.Supp. 465.

Insurer cannot bring action alone

Employer's insurer, paying compensation awarded injured employee under federal statute, cannot bring action alone against third person causing injury for damages, but may demand that employer do so and, if he refuses, bring such action and make employer party thereto.

N.Y.—Globe Indem. Co. v. Atlantic Lighterage Corp., 2 N.E.2d 640, 271 N.Y. 234.

signee of an injured workman's claim, brings an action against an asserted wrongdoer to recover damages for injuries, the insurance carrier is a real party in interest and a motion by defendant to eliminate from the pleadings certain portions thereof which make reference to the original plaintiff will be granted.⁶

Absence of award. Where the subrogation of an insurer to the rights and duties of the employer depends on insurer's assumption of the employer's liability to pay compensation or the insurer's payment of compensation for which the employer is liable, the insurer is a proper party plaintiff to an action against a third person for injury to an employee even though an award of compensation has not been made when the action is commenced, if liability to pay compensation is created by the act and not by the award.⁷ On the other hand, under a provision that the acceptance of an award shall operate as an assignment to the employer of any right to recover damages which the employee may have against a third person and that insurer who pays, or assumes liability for, compensation shall be subrogated to the rights of the employer, the view has been expressed that it is improper to permit an insurer to become a party to an action against a third person before an award is made.⁸ Where, however, it appears on the face of the complaint by an employee against a third person that no award had been made by the industrial commission and that neither the employer nor his insurer has admitted or accepted liability, the employer and insurer are neither necessary nor proper parties.⁹

Effect of failure of employer to become party. Fact that an employer has not become or been made a party to an action by the employee against the third-person wrongdoer does not prevent subrogation of the employer, given by some acts, out of the fund recovered.¹⁰

In Louisiana, in an action by an insurer against a third person to recover compensation paid, and expenses of medical services rendered to an injured employee, based on a conventional assignment and subrogation made by the employer to the insurer, the employer is not a necessary party in view of his assignment.¹¹

Under some workmen's compensation acts, it is proper to join as parties the employee or personal representative of a deceased employee with the employer or insurer in an action against a third-person tort-feasor, where those who are made parties have an interest in the recovery.

The propriety of joining as parties the employee, or the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee, with the employer¹² or insurer¹³ has been recognized where those who are made parties have, or may have, an interest in the recovery, as has the right of the employee or dependents to make the employer or insurer a party defendant if he refuses to join.¹⁴ The view has been

Involuntary plaintiff
Where employee of independent contractor brought third-party action against owner of premises upon which he was injured and for which workmen's compensation had already been paid, and compensation carrier filed waiver of right to participate in suit but specifically reserved right to share in proceeds as provided by Wisconsin statute, there was no error in joining such carrier as an involuntary plaintiff.

U.S.—Hrabak v. Madison Gas & Elec. Co., C.A.Wis., 240 F.2d 472.
Waiver
The failure of dependents of deceased employee who had elected to accept compensation for death of employee to make insurance carrier a party plaintiff in action against tort-feasor, or if carrier refused to join, to make it a party defendant, was at most a defect in parties plaintiff, which was waived unless raised.
Utah.—Johanson v. Cudahy Packing Co., 152 P.2d 98, 107 Utah 114.
14. Utah.—Johanson v. Cudahy Packing Co., supra.
Right of employee or dependents to make the employer or insurer who has an interest in the recovery a party defendant see supra § 1019 b.

taken, however, that, where the act provides for an election by the dependents of a deceased employee and for the subrogation of the employer to the rights of dependents to recover against a third person, if compensation is claimed and awarded, it constitutes a misjoinder if dependents are made parties plaintiff in an action by the employer if compensation has been claimed and awarded.¹⁵

Where an award of compensation operates in general to vest in the insurance carrier the entire cause of action, as discussed supra § 996, and an assignment has been effected, the view has been taken that the employee to whom an award has been made may not properly be joined with insurer as coplaintiff,¹⁶ even though insurer, after payment of the award of compensation, irrevocably declares itself a trustee for the benefit of the employee of any surplus that may be recovered;¹⁷ but the propriety of permitting a plaintiff employee to bring in the insurer as coplaintiff has been recognized where the insurer consents and defendant has set up as a defense the alleged election of plaintiff to take compensation.¹⁸ Also, where, on the employee's election to take workmen's compensation, the employee's cause of action against a wrongdoer is, under statute, assigned to the employer, the employer is not required, on the employee's death after action has been begun against the wrongdoer, to join the employee's personal representative as the real party in interest.¹⁹

jured employee may maintain an action without joining as plaintiff the employer or the employer's insurer,²⁰ and a negligent third person is not entitled to join an insurer as an additional party plaintiff in the absence of a showing that fairness requires a joinder.²¹

Under a statute providing that either the employee or the employer may institute an action in his own name, an employer who starts an action against a third-person tort-feasor to recover for workmen's compensation paid and payable to a widow of employee is not required to join the personal representative of the deceased employee as a party.²² Under another statute making a lessor of a motor vehicle liable for damage caused by its operation while so leased, a lessor may not join as a party defendant a lessee who is the employer of the injured person and also the employer of the person whose negligence caused the injury, because the statutory liability of the lessor as such is separate and distinct from the liability of the lessee under the workmen's compensation statute.²³

Employer and insurer. Where the act provides for an election by the dependents of a deceased employee and for the subrogation of the employer to the rights of dependents to recover against a third person if compensation is claimed or awarded, the propriety of joining insurer as a party plaintiff with the employer has been recognized because of a general rule, sometimes recognized, granting to insurers the right of subrogation by operation of law to sue the one who has caused the damages or loss which insurer has paid or is paying.²⁴

Tort-feasor may not complain of joinder of employer as a defendant where it does not appear that his interests were adversely affected by joinder.

Coplaintiff

Where injured employee sued tort-feasor, and made his employer's compensation insurer a party defendant, alleging that insurer claimed an interest in the cause of action because of compensation paid to injured employee, insurer became in effect a coplaintiff with injured employee, and it was immaterial that insurer was first made a defendant.

§ 1021. — New Parties, Intervention, and Substitution

Where an employee elects to bring an action against an alleged third-person wrongdoer and there is no liability of the employer other than for workmen's compensation, the defendant may not bring in the employer as a party defendant; but it is usually held that an employer or his insurer may intervene in an action by the employee to enforce a right of subrogation or other right against the third person.

Where the compensation act gives the employer the right of subrogation, according to some cases, defendant in an action by the employee may make the employer a party to the record for the purpose of protection,²⁵ and may by timely and appropriate exception for nonjoinder require that the employer shall be made a party either as plaintiff or defendant.²⁶ Under an act providing that awarding compensation shall operate as an assignment to the person liable for compensation, the right of plaintiff employee to bring in, on motion, insurer as co-plaintiff has been recognized,²⁷ at least where plaintiff asserts, contrary to the claim of defendant, that no valid award had been made.²⁸

Where an employee or the personal representative of a deceased employee elects to bring an action against an alleged third-person wrongdoer, pursuant to the compensation act, and there is no liability of the employer other than for compensation under the act, defendant may not, on motion, bring in the employer as a party defendant for the purpose of having the employer held liable as a joint tort-feasor,²⁹ and a like rule has been recognized

Federal statutes

(1) Ship, sued for an accident, by a harbor worker, cannot implead harbor worker's employer as joint tort-feasor, because of provision of Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act that employer's liability for accidents to its employees shall be limited to the compensation provided by the Act. U.S.—Johnson v. U. S., D.C.Or., 79 F. Supp. 448—Calvino v. Pan-Atlantic S. S. Corp., D.C.N.Y., 29 F.Supp. 1022.

D.C.—Christie v. Powder Power Tool Corp., D.C., 124 F.Supp. 693.

Joint tort-feasors statute

(1) Where employee and employer had elected to have their rights adjudged and fixed pursuant to terms of workmen's compensation act, employee could not lawfully maintain action in tort against his employer for injury, and hence the employer was not a person liable in tort within statute allowing contribution between joint tort-feasors.

N.J.—Farren v. New Jersey Turnpike Authority, 106 A.2d 752, 31 N.J. Super. 356.

(2) Where employee's dependents were awarded workmen's compensation and brought an action against third person for employee's death, third person was not entitled under the Joint Tort-Feasors' Act to join employer as a party defendant, particularly where third person alleged that employer was solely responsible for employee's injury, notwithstanding under the act employer would be entitled to repayment of compensation award.

Md.—Baltimore Transit Co. v. State, to Use of Schriefer, 39 A.2d 858, 183 Md. 674, 156 A.L.R. 460.

Agreement between employer and tort-feasor

Where administratrix of employee availed herself of the workmen's compensation act for remedy against employer and there was an indemnification agreement between employer and the city on whose premises the fatal injury occurred, city, when sued at common law for the employee's death, was entitled to file a third-party complaint bringing in the employer and the insurer on the indemnity bond.

No common-law liability

In action for death of contractor's employee against subcontractor whose truck allegedly ran over employee, subcontractor was not authorized to make the contractor an additional party defendant, where the contractor had paid the award made by the industrial commission and had been expressly relieved of any common-law liability under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Recovery of damages from fellow employee

Where defendant's bus was allegedly involved in collision with motor vehicle in which plaintiff was passenger, and operator of motor vehicle, as a defense to defendant's in an action by the personal representative where compensation has been paid,³⁰ and in an action by the insurer in the name of the injured employee³¹ or in its own name.³² Consequently, a defendant cannot retain the employer as an additional defendant on the ground that it is solely liable to the employee or the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee, since the employer's liability is only that prescribed by the workmen's compensation act.³³ On the other hand, if the employer is liable over to, or jointly liable with, the original defendant, the employer may be summoned by the original defendant as an additional defendant for the exclusive purpose of protecting the original defendant's right of contribution.³⁴ It has been stated, moreover, that the right of a tort-feasor to implead the employer as a third-party defendant may not be defeated on the ground that the result would be to make the employer indirectly liable for injuries to the employee although the employer has complied with the workmen's compensation law.³⁵

Some provisions as to the enforcement of a negligent party's liability for resulting injuries to another's employee imply that the employer, his insurance carrier, or the employee bringing the original action against such party shall have the exclusive privilege to prosecute the action to a final determination, and a court will not interfere by making additional parties unless compelled by extraordinary circumstances to do so.³⁶ third-party action, alleged that at time of accident he and plaintiff were fellow employees engaged in course of their employment and that Colorado workmen's compensation act precludes recovery of damages from fellow employee, if operator was fellow employee of plaintiff, defendant could not recover indemnification from operator, by reason of the act. U.S.—Hamblen v. Santa Fe Trail Transp. Co., D.C.Colo., 101 F.Supp. 799.

Refusal to implead employer held not error where plaintiff's employer waived right to participate in employee's action under safe-place statute against defendant.

Writs of scire facias

(1) Where general contractor's workmen who had elected to accept compensation allowed under Pennsylvania workmen's compensation law brought personal injury actions against subcontractor and subcontractor issued writs of scire facias, under Pennsylvania law, to bring in the general contractor as additional defendant, motion to quash writ of scire facias was required to be determined according to mandate of the state legislature rather than in accordance with rules of legal logic. Right of third person sued for injuries or death to contribution or indemnity from employer generally see supra § 982 c.

Employer's insurer

In action by third party's employee against a motor vehicle owner's liability insurer for injuries sustained in a collision, employer's insurer, under compensation policy and policy insuring against liability for employer's torts, could be made a third party defendant, though the employee under Louisiana workmen's compensation law could not sue his own employer in tort to determine liability of employer's insurer should the employer be found jointly liable with motor vehicle owner and compelled by such joint tort-feasor to contribute to payment of damages. U.S.—Robinson v. National Auto. & Cas. Ins. Co., D.C.La., 75 F.Supp. 489.

Federal statutes

(1) Owner of vessel was entitled to implead employer, notwithstanding provision of Longshoremen's Compensation Act making liability of employer for compensation exclusive, where shipowner sought recovery against employer by way of contribution or indemnity only. (2) Right of employee, suing shipowner for injuries sustained aboard ship while doing work under employer's independent contract with defendant, to recover compensation from employer under Longshoremen's Compensation Act did not preclude defendant from filing proper third-party complaint impleading employer.

Action against landlord

Tenant's obtaining a general liability insurance policy protecting landlord and tenant against any claim for injuries to person on demised premises did not authorize dismissal of landlord's cross complaint against tenant in action against landlord for death of tenant's employee who fell down elevator shaft, and provisions of workmen's compensation law would not prevent recovery by landlord on third-party complaint against tenant.

N.Y.—Clements v. Rockefeller, supra.

36. N.C.—Lovette v. Lloyd, 73 S.E. 2d 886, 236 N.C. 663.

37. Discretion

It was not an abuse of discretion to deny a motion by employer to intervene where both employee and tort-feasor objected.

Ill.—Hyland v. 79 West Monroe Corp., 118 N.E.2d 686, 2 Ill.App.2d 83.

Protection of lien

However, where employee brought or his insurance carrier³⁸ to intervene in an action by an employee or the dependents of a deceased employee against a third person for injuries to, or death of, such employee has been denied, at least where no statutory provision is made for subrogation of insurer to the rights, if any, of the employer against a third person,³⁹ it is usually held or recognized that the employer⁴⁰ or insurer⁴¹ may intervene in an action by the employee, or by the personal representative or dependents of a deceased employee, to enforce the right of subrogation, or other right against a third person,⁴² which is given by the compensation act. Moreover, it has been held if an employer does not intervene he loses all right to proceed against the tort-feasor and he may only claim reimbursement from the employee out of such damages as the employee may recover.⁴³ There is also authority for the view that, while an employer may sue in the name of the employee or the representative of a deceased employee, as discussed supra § 1017, the employer must be the active litigant and he cannot break into a proceeding as intervener where the original plaintiff has no cause of action.⁴⁴ action for personal injuries against third person after award had been made to employee under workmen's compensation act, employer could intervene for purpose of protecting his lien for amount employer was obligated to pay employee under act, but such intervention did not extend to employer the right to participate in the conduct or trial of the suit without consent of plaintiff.

38. Fla.—Fidelity & Cas. Co. of N. Y. v. Bedingsfield, 60 So.2d 489.

Dismissal

Where injured employee filed action at law against alleged actual tort-feasor, insurance carrier, which had paid employee compensation for injuries and medical expenses, had no legal right to assert its claim for reimbursement under statute by intervention in such action which would prevent employee from dismissing action without consent of insurance carrier; and fact that intervention of insurance carrier was allowed without objection and no exception taken to order of allowance would not prevent employee from dismissing suit without consent of insurance carrier.

Ga.—Travelers Ins. Co. v. Bumstead, 186 S.E. 742, 182 Ga. 692, answers to certified questions conformed to 187 S.E. 736, 54 Ga.App. 284.

Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act

Where owner of vessel, being sued by administratrix for death of employee of cleaning company while working on respondent's vessel, impleaded decedent's employer, seeking recovery against employer by way of contribution or indemnity, employer's insurance carrier was not entitled to intervene as a party plaintiff, since its interest would be adverse to that of plaintiff as respects recovery of any amount in excess of compensation due plaintiff under Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

The right of the employer to intervene before verdict to enforce his right of subrogation has been recognized,⁴⁵ as has the right of the insurer to intervene for such purpose after the trial has commenced where the intervention does not delay the trial or work any injury to defendant.⁴⁶ Although it has been held that the right of the subrogee ceases if he fails to intervene before the suit is brought to judgment,⁴⁷ there is authority for the view that the employer is not bound to intervene in an action by the employee in order to preserve the right of subrogation.⁴⁸

An employee or his personal representative has been held entitled to intervene in an action against an alleged negligent third person by the employer or his insurer, even though compensation has been paid to the injured employee.⁴⁹

Substitution. The right of insurer who has paid compensation to be substituted as plaintiff in an action commenced in the name of the personal representative of a deceased employee has been recognized.⁵⁰ The insurer may not be substituted as plaintiff for the employee after the limitation period has run where, due to a statutory assignment of the cause of action to the insurer, the employee had no cause of action when he instituted the proceeding.⁵¹

§ 1022. Pleading

The general rules of pleading apply.

The pleadings in an action by an injured employee against a third-person tort-feasor, wherein the compensation insurer seeks to intervene, are governed by the general rules relating to the pleadings in civil actions.⁵² Where the employer is impleaded as a defendant for the purpose of protecting the tort-feasor's right of contribution, the employer-employee relationship may not be pleaded.⁵³ If insurer refuses to sue a third person causing the employee's injury and is made party defendant in an action for death, wherein plaintiff sues for insurer's benefit, insurer is not entitled to recover where no pleading is filed in its own name.⁵⁴ Where a person may receive compensation and at the same time maintain an action in tort against a third person, the fact that he did claim and receive compensation under the compensation act has no place in the pleadings in the common-law action.⁵⁵

the death of the employee, an averment that the employee and his employer were subject to the compensation act has been held essential,⁵⁷ and this is so even where defendant was not a party to the compensation proceedings.⁵⁸ It is not necessary to allege in the declaration that, pursuant to the statute, a notice of election to sue the third person was given.⁵⁹

Plaintiff's capacity to sue. Rules already stated as to the right of an employee to sue a third person, as discussed supra § 983 et seq, enter into a determination of the sufficiency of a showing in plaintiff's pleading as to his right to prosecute the action.⁶⁰ So, where the act gives the employee the right to bring the action where the employer or insurer, entitled to subrogation under the act, fails to sue within a specified time after demand, plaintiff employee need not allege waiver by the employer of the subrogated right to sue⁶¹ or the essentials, prescribed by the act, of the employee's right to sue.⁶² A complaint, although not alleging that the employee elected to bring an action against the third person instead of seeking his remedy under the compensation act, has been held sufficient.⁶³ Dependents of a deceased employee, who elected to accept compensation for the employee's death prior to bringing the action against the third-person wrongdoer based on the theory of assignment by insurer to them of its cause of action, are not required to allege that the employer or insurer has paid compensation awarded, as a condition precedent to bringing a suit against the tort-feasor.⁶⁴

Where the employee may maintain the action notwithstanding the employer is a subrogee under the act, as considered supra § 1003, plaintiff employee need not allege the failure or refusal of the employer to bring the action.⁶⁵ A complaint, sufficiently alleging the subrogation of the compensation fund to the rights of the deceased employee's dependents to recover damages for the employee's death from the third-person wrongdoer, states the facts authorizing the state to bring the action against such third person, although the complaint does not allege that any demand to sue was made on the persons entitled under the statute to bring the action before the personal representative may bring it.⁶⁶ Where plaintiff employee seeks to avoid the effect of an election to take compensation from his employer as defeating his right of action against the third-person wrongdoer, the issue must be raised by the pleading.⁶⁷

Negating employment by defendant or application of compensation act to employment. Allegations which definitely exclude the theory that the injured or deceased employee was an employee of defendant have been held sufficient to negative the fact of such employment⁶⁸ and to show that defendant is a "person other than the employer" within the meaning of the act.⁶⁹ Where plaintiff's pleading sets up no relationship of master and servant between plaintiff and defendant and no other facts which would make the workmen's compensation act applicable, it is not necessary to allege matters to take the case out of, or to negative the force of, the act.⁷⁰

Provisions of act benefiting defendant or relieving him from liability. According to some cases plaintiff employee need not negative the terms of a provision of the compensation act which permit a person other than the employee to have the benefit of the act⁷¹ or which create defenses, in a common-law action by the employee,⁷² or, it seems, in an action brought by a dependent of a deceased employee for the death of such employee.⁷³ A complaint is, however, demurrable where the allegations therein show that defendant is, under the act, immune from an action against him by plaintiff employee,⁷⁴ but a demurrer will not lie where such allegations are lacking.⁷⁵

Notwithstanding an employee or the personal representative of a deceased employee has no cause of action for a compensable injury or death where the employee, his employer, and defendant were all subject to the compensation act, the view has been taken that in a common-law action by the employee⁷⁶ or in an action under the injuries act for the death of an employee in which there is nothing to show that deceased employee was under the compensation act,⁷⁷ it is not necessary to allege that defendant was not under the compensation act, and where in an action for the death of an employee, it clearly appears that defendant was not under the act, no reference to the act need be made;⁷⁸ likewise, in an action under the injuries act, it has been held that it is not necessary to allege that the deceased employee was not under the compensation act.⁷⁹ There is, however, authority for the view that, in view of such provision relieving a person subject to the act from liability to an employee, where the allegations raise a presumption that plaintiff's employer and defendant were subject to the act and that the injury complained of arose out of, and in the course of, plaintiff's employment, plaintiff should make allegations showing that plaintiff's employer⁸⁰ or defendant⁸¹ was not bound by the act.

plaintiff employee, the court will not assume that defendant was an employer within the act unless the allegations of the complaint show that fact with certainty and precision.⁸²

Tort or wrong of defendant and duty to employee. In an action for the death of an employee, for the use of his dependents, the absence of allegations sufficient to show the existence of an actionable wrong on the part of defendant renders the declaration insufficient on demurrer.⁸³ In such action, where there are allegations in respect of a contract between defendant and the deceased employee's employer which are appropriate to show that the contract was the occasion for deceased's rightful presence on defendant's property at the time and place of the injury and to show that deceased was acting as an employee of independent contractors, it is not necessary that the terms and effect of the contract should be more particularly stated.⁸⁴

Damages. Where an employee sues the third-person wrongdoer in his own right ex delicto, it has been held that the amount of damages must be alleged.⁸⁵

b. Action by, or on Behalf of, Employer or Insurer

In an action by, or on behalf of, an employer or insurer for an injury to, or the death of, an employee, the plaintiff's pleadings must state facts sufficient to show a cause of action, and the necessity of alleging facts which show that the plaintiff insurer has acquired the right to reimbursement out of a recovery from a third person has been recognized.

General rules applicable to declarations, complaints, or petitions in tort actions apply in an action by, or on behalf of, the employer or an insurer for an injury to, or the death of, an employee.⁸⁶ It has been held that an insurer may include in its complaint a claim for injuries sustained by the employee.⁸⁷ Likewise, the employer or insurer should allege that the third person was liable to the employee.⁸⁸ Where a complaint by an insurer sets forth the facts concerning the status of both the employee and insurer, and recites that the damages sought are in behalf of both, such complaint is sufficient, without naming the employee as a party plaintiff.⁸⁹ The fact that an employer's original complaint is based on a statute, subsequently held unconstitutional, is immaterial, if such complaint contains essential elements of a cause of action.⁹⁰

Where an employer seeks indemnification out of the proceeds of a recovery against a third-person wrongdoer for compensation paid the injured employee, a petition which does not allege that the injury was not proximately caused by the negligence of the employer or his employees has been held insufficient,⁹¹ although it has been held that an employer is not required affirmatively to allege the employee's freedom from negligence in order to state a cause of action.⁹² Under a provision requiring an employer, instituting a suit against the third-person wrongdoer for reimbursement for compensation paid the employee, "forthwith" to notify the employee, the employer's petition is not defective because of the failure to allege that such notice was given.⁹³

Employer's or insurer's rights or interest. The necessity of alleging facts which show that plaintiff insurer has acquired the right to reimbursement out of a recovery from a third person has been recognized.⁹⁴ So, it has been held that an insurer is required to set out policy provisions, if any, authorizing subrogation to the rights of the employer;⁹⁵ but the omission of an allegation that plaintiff is an insurance carrier which is entitled to subrogation under the provision of the compensation act is immaterial where that fact is necessarily implied from allegations actually made.⁹⁶

Where an employer's right to recover damages from a third person for the death of an employee is not dependent on the appointment of a personal representative of the deceased employee, as discussed supra § 1010, the omission from the declaration of an allegation of the appointment of a personal representative does not render the declaration insufficient as not stating a cause of action.⁹⁷ An employer's complaint does not state a cause of action where it is impossible to ascertain who the dependents are to whom the employer claims to be subrogated.⁹⁸ Where an insurer who has paid compensation is entitled to relief against a third person both under a provision of the compensation act which subrogates insurer to all the rights and actions to which the employer is entitled under the act and also under a statute giving a right of action for every act which causes damage to another, insurer need not, in an action by him against a person who caused the injury to the employee, specifically state whether it sues as legal subrogee under the compensation act or whether it claims under such other statute.⁹⁹

In an action by an employer under his right of subrogation given by the compensation act, an allegation in the declaration of nonwaiver of the employer's right of subrogation is not necessary.¹ Under an act providing that, if an injured employee elects to take compensation, awarding compensation shall operate as an assignment to the person liable for compensation of the cause of action against a person not in the same employ, in an action by insurer allegations setting up the election of the employee to take compensation and the fact that the election and award operated as an assignment of the cause of action are proper.²

While the view has been expressed that, under a provision for the subrogation of the employer to the right of the employee to the extent of the compensation payable, the statement of plaintiff employee in an action against a third person should show that plaintiff has sued for himself and his employer as their respective interests may appear,³ under a provision that, if compensation is paid, insurer may enforce in the name of the employee or in its own name and for its own benefit the liability of a person other than the employer, it is not necessary to allege in an action brought in the name of the employee that the action is brought in the name of the employee for the benefit of insurer,⁴ at least where a consent signed by insurer is attached to the complaint.⁵ Where under a provision for subrogation of the employer who has paid, or has become liable to pay, compensation, the employee's cause of action is not extinguished if the employee elects to take compensation but is kept alive for the benefit of the employer, an amendment of the declaration in an action by the employee, setting forth his election to take, and the receipt of, compensation does not introduce a new cause of action⁶ and is permissible.⁷

Employee subject to compensation act. Where the presumption is that if an employer is operating under the act his employee is bound by its terms, as considered supra § 125, and, in an action by the employer against the person liable for the injury to the employee, to enforce a right given by statute where such person is within the compensation act, it is specifically alleged that both plaintiff and defendant are under the act, the omission of an allegation that the employee was under the act does not render the declaration defective.⁸

Negating employment. Where, under the compensation act, the liability enforceable is that of a "person other than the employer," allegations which definitely exclude the theory that the employee was an employee of defendant are sufficient to show that defendant is a "person other than the employer" within the meaning of the act.⁹

Election of defendant as to being bound by the act. It seems that where the employer has, under the act, a right to enforce the liability of a person who has elected not to be bound by the act, for an injury to the employee, it is necessary to allege in the declaration in an action by the employer to enforce such liability that defendant had elected not to be bound by the act;¹⁰ but in an action by an employer pursuant to a provision that, where compensation is payable, the employer may enforce the liability of a person who has elected to be bound by the act, it is not necessary to allege that defendant has elected to be bound by the compensation act if facts are alleged which, under the act, raise a presumption that defendant has elected to be bound by the act.¹¹

Actionable wrong or tort of defendant and duty to employee. In an action for the use of insurer based on the death of an employee, the absence from the declaration of allegations sufficient to show the violation by defendant of some duty which defendant owed to such employee renders the declaration insufficient on demurrer.¹² The omission, however, of an allegation of the terms of the applicable provision defining the conditions under which defendant shall be liable does not render the declaration fatally defective where from the facts alleged the existence of such conditions must necessarily be inferred.¹³ A count of the complaint in an action by insurer for reimbursement, which states in greater detail the wrongful conduct of which plaintiff complains which was set forth in more general language in other counts, has been upheld on demurrer.¹⁴

In an action for the benefit of insurer, based on the death of an employee, where there are allegations in respect of a contract between defendant and the deceased employee's employer which are appropriate to show that the contract was the occasion for deceased's rightful presence on defendant's property at the time and place of the injury and to show that deceased was acting as an employee of independent contractors, it is not necessary that the terms and effect of the contract should be more particularly stated.¹⁵ In respect of defendant's act constituting the cause of the death of an employee, it is sufficiently alleged that the injury inflicted by defendant was the cause of the death if that fact is necessarily inferable from the facts alleged.¹⁶

Damages; payment of compensation. Where, under the compensation act, in an action in the name of the employee for the benefit of insurer, the liability of defendant, including liability in respect of the amount recoverable, is the same as in an action for the benefit of the employee, an allegation that insurer made certain payments to the injured employee, while permissible,¹⁷ is not necessary.¹⁸ Likewise, an insurer suing the third-person wrongdoer for wrongful death of the employee, is not required to state in his petition the amount of compensation paid the dependent of the deceased employee,¹⁹ and an employer's petition need not specifically allege the amount of damages the employee sustained as a result of the accident involved.²⁰ Where the act provides that the awarding of compensation shall operate as an assignment to the person liable for compensation, the view has been expressed that allegations setting up the amount or details of the award as a basis or element of damages or as a separate cause of action are unnecessary²¹ and improper.²² There is a sufficient allegation that the amount of compensation was fixed and determined where it is alleged that an order was entered directing plaintiff employer to pay a specified amount in weekly installments and that thereafter plaintiff proceeded to pay these installments.²³

§ 1024. — Plea or Answer

- a. Action by, or on behalf of, employee, his dependents, or beneficiaries
- b. Action by, or on behalf of, employer or insurer

a. Action by, or on Behalf of, Employee, His Dependents, or Beneficiaries

In an action by, or on behalf of, an employee, a defendant who seeks the benefit of a provision of the compensation act must by his pleading bring himself within such provision, and he must plead such defenses as are based on the act.

General rules as to pleas or answers in tort actions apply in actions by, or on behalf of, an employee, or dependents or the personal representative of a deceased employee, prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a workmen's compensation act.²⁴ In such an action, in general, defendant who seeks the benefit of a provision of the compensation act must by his pleading bring himself within such provision,²⁵ and he must plead such defenses as are based on the act,²⁶ as, for example, acceptance of compensation by plaintiff employee from his employer,²⁷ subrogation of the employer,²⁸ assignment to the employer,²⁹ or to insurer,³⁰ under the act of another state,³¹ and defendant's liability under the act for compensation for the injury complained of in the action.³² A plea in bar based on the alleged receipt of compensation by plaintiff employee from his employer is bad where it fails to allege that the injury arose out of, and in the course of, plaintiff's employment.³³

Defendant's answer that the employee accepted and is receiving benefits under the compensation act,³⁴ or that plaintiff filed a claim for compensa-

In suit for wrongful death against employer and another, plea by third person that plaintiff agreed with defendant to accept compensation, setting forth copy of alleged agreement containing statements amounting to admissions of employer-employee relationship and applicability of compensation act, stated valid defense. Ga.—Smith v. Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky, 173 S.E. 879, 178 Ga. 651.

Allegations held insufficient

In personal injury action, amendment of answers by adding allegations that action was commenced over six months after first workmen's compensation award to plaintiff and hence barred under statute assigning cause after six-months period to compensation carrier, was insufficient to state defense because of failure to allege that plaintiff had taken compensation.

Defense to be pleaded affirmatively

Plea that injured employee has lost right to sue third-party tortfeasor for his injuries because of statutory transfer of cause of action to employer or insurance carrier by reason of employee's taking compensation and not suing third person within six months of award of compensation and within one year from date cause of action accrues, more closely resembles a plea that plaintiff is not real party in interest than a plea of bar of statute of limitations, but in any event such plea is one based on collateral facts showing action not to be maintainable and must be pleaded affirmatively.

tion,³⁵ or that the action is barred by limitations,³⁶ has been held insufficient in the absence of allegations that an award for compensation has been made. Under a statute providing that an acceptance of compensation under an award in a compensation order filed by a deputy commissioner should operate as an assignment to employer of all right to recover damages against a third-person wrongdoer, a defense is not stated in the absence of any allegation that the deputy commissioner has ever filed the compensation order,³⁷ or that compensation was accepted under an award;³⁸ although it has been held that there is no need to allege that payment was made pursuant to an award under the act.³⁹ Under the same statute, a defense alleging the provisions of the act pertaining to compensation and alleging that the employer paid to claimant compensation is not sufficient to show an election by claimant to receive compensation under the act, in the absence of allegations that compensation was received under an award.⁴⁰

Where an allegation that plaintiff was in the employ of a person other than defendant is denied by the answer, it is proper to permit the defense of assumption of risk⁴¹ and that the injuries were due to the negligence of a fellow servant.⁴² Likewise, the negligence of a fellow employee as a sole proximate cause of the injury to the employee may be shown under a general denial, and, if established, the complaint must be dismissed, regardless of the compensation law or the rights thereunder against the employer.⁴³ A motion by third-party plaintiff to amend an answer by including provisions of the compensation law barring an action by an injured employee against his fellow-employee for damages resulting from the latter's negligence will be denied where there is no allegation that the third-party plaintiff was the employer or the coemployee of plaintiff.⁴⁴ Allegations that medical, surgical, and hospital services have been, or were being, furnished plaintiff by the United States, by which he was employed when injured, and that he was not, and will not be, required to pay therefor, states a proper partial defense, where plaintiff is not obligated to make a refund for such services.⁴⁵

Where under the act, the employee or the personal representative of a deceased employee may maintain an action against a person who is not bound by the act, even though compensation under the act has been claimed, a plea that the employee and his employer were both subject to the act and that defendant was not subject to the act does not state a defense,⁴⁶ nor does a plea that the employee has accepted compensation from his employer.⁴⁷ Where defendant seeks to avoid liability on the ground that the employee, his employer, and defendant were all bound by the act and that the employee was engaged in the course of his employment when the injury occurred, it is essential to a good plea that it should appear that the employer was engaged in an occupation which is within the compensation act,⁴⁸ and that facts should be alleged from which it may be inferred that the employee was actually engaged in the course of his employment when the injury occurred.⁴⁹ The plea is sufficient, however, where it alleges facts which show that the employee, his employer, and defendant were all bound by the act and that the injury occurred in the course of, and arose out of, the employment.⁵⁰

In an action by the personal representative for the death of employee, an allegation of the answer that full compensation has been paid under the compensation act does not raise an inference that the amount received as compensation equals the maximum amount recoverable under the death statute.⁵¹ A defendant's plea that the administrator cannot maintain an action because the intestate and his employer at the time of the accident were subject to the compensation act is demurrable in the absence of an averment that the intestate is survived by dependents who were entitled to compensation.⁵²

Answer showing that defendant was independent contractor. Under some acts an answer which shows that defendant was an independent contractor under a contract with the employer of the employee for whose death the action is brought shows that the act does not apply to relieve defendant from liability in the action.⁵³

Amended answer not inconsistent with pleadings. In an action by the employee the propriety of permitting defendant to file an amended answer by alleging that plaintiff had elected to take compensation under the act and was thereby precluded from maintaining the action has been recognized, as against an objection that such amendment was inconsistent with, and changed the issues raised by, the prior pleadings.⁵⁴

Striking allegations. Where, in an action by the personal representative of a deceased employee, there are joined in the declaration a count for the death of the employee and a count for his conscious suffering, it has been held that plaintiff is entitled to have defendant's answer amended by striking as prejudicial an allegation that plaintiff was barred from recovery because he had received compensation.⁵⁵ Plaintiff's motion to strike defenses set up in amended answers of third parties that plaintiff received and accepted compensation under the compensation act, that plaintiff was never legally authorized by the commission to prosecute the action in his own name, and that he was not the real party in interest, will be granted where plaintiff has the right to prosecute the action either at request of the commission or on his own initiative.⁵⁶

b. Action by, or on Behalf of, Employer or Insurer

As a general rule, in an action by an employer for the death of an employee, the defendant may plead the contributory negligence of the employee as a defense.

General rules as to pleas or answers in tort actions apply in actions on behalf of an employer or insurer, and in accordance with the general rule applicable in most jurisdictions, in an action by an employer for the death of an employee, defendant may plead the contributory negligence of the employee⁵⁷ and assumption of risk⁵⁸ as a defense. The view has been taken that an allegation by defendant that the injury was wholly the result of the negligence of the employee is not sufficient to set up the defense of contributory negligence of the employee.⁵⁹

The third-person tort-feasor, when sued for damages for an injury to an employee which is compensable under the compensation act, is entitled to plead contributory negligence on the part of the employer as a bar to reimbursement pro tanto for the award paid.⁶⁰ The alleged negligence of the employee, however, cannot be made the basis of an independent plea in bar of the right of the employer to recover over against defendant as an original and primary wrongdoer.⁶¹ Any alleged negligence of the employer which is entirely independent of the negligence imputed to him under the doctrine of respondeat superior because of the negligent or wrongful conduct of the employee, who was injured or killed, may be pleaded in bar of plaintiff's right to recover, pro tanto, in behalf of the employer or his insurance carrier.⁶² On the other hand, any alleged negligence of such employee who has received, or whose estate has received, compensation from the employer under the compensation act, must be pleaded, if at all, as a bar to the whole action without reference to any rights of the employer to share in the recovery.⁶³

In an action under the workmen's compensation act, by an insurer who had paid compensation, in the name of the personal representatives of a deceased employee against a third person for the employee's death and conscious suffering, allegations in the answer that the nominal plaintiff had elected to receive, and had been paid compensation, have been regarded as immaterial and irrelevant,⁶⁴ and may properly be stricken on motion,⁶⁵ and a motion to amend an answer in an action by insurer in the name of the employee by adding allegations that plaintiff had proceeded under the compensation act and had received compensation thereunder is properly denied.⁶⁶ Where the recovery by an insurer or employer against the third person is limited to the financial loss of the employer, as discussed supra § 1039, allegations as to the real party in interest, the amount of compensation paid, and others of similar import are material to the defense and are properly included in the answer.⁶⁷

Pleading statute of limitations. The necessity of defendant's pleading the statute of limitations to the intervening petition of an insurer in an action by an employee, in order to claim the benefit of the statute, has been recognized.⁶⁸ In an action by the state insurance fund, defenses alleging that the employee was an infant at the time of the accident, but not alleging that no guardian had been appointed for the employee, or that the employee commenced an action within a certain time after reaching majority, or that compensation was awarded after reaching majority but less than a certain time prior to the commencement of the instant action, are insufficient.⁶⁹

§ 1025. — Verification

tion in an action by an employer against a third-person tort-feasor need not be verified.

In the absence of statutory requirement, a declaration in an action by an employer for the injury to, or the death of, an employee need not be verified,⁷⁰ and in such action, brought pursuant to a provision that the right of the employee or the personal representative to recover against a person other than the employer shall be subrogated to the employer, the view has been taken that a general statute requiring an allegation by oath or affidavit that the alleged subrogee is the actual bona fide subrogee does not apply,⁷¹ and it is not necessary for the employer to set forth on oath that he is a bona fide subrogee.⁷² It has been held, however, that an employer's motion to amend the complaint by verifying it could have been allowed where the ultimate facts were stipulated and accepted as true.⁷³

§ 1026. — Issues, Proof, and Variance

- a. Action by, or on behalf of, employee, his dependents, or beneficiaries of allegations in his pleading that the employee and his employer were subject to the compensation act,⁷⁵ or of a plea in bar setting forth an agreement under the act pursuant to which it is claimed, compensation was paid.⁷⁶ Even where plaintiff employee sets up a common-law right of action, however, the view has been expressed that under the general issue defendant may introduce evidence that plaintiff was under the workmen's compensation act.⁷⁷

It has been held that the issue as to whether, through acceptance of compensation payments, the employee has lost his right of action against the third person is properly raised by a motion as against a contention that it should have been raised by the answer.⁷⁸

General rules as to issues, proof, and variance between pleading and proof in tort actions apply in an action by, or on behalf of, an employer or an insurer against a third-person tort-feasor; and an employer has to plead and prove that he was not guilty of negligence that was the proximate cause of the injury sustained by the employee.

General rules as to issues, proof, and variance between pleading and proof in tort actions apply in an action by, or on behalf of, an employer or an insurer against a person who caused the injury to, or the death of, an employee. Accordingly, an employer suing a third person under the compensation act for injuries sustained by his employee while in the course of his employment has been held required, both by pleading and proof, to bring himself within the requirements of the act as a condition to his right of recovery.⁷⁹ An insurer under a contract executed in one state is not entitled by reason of subrogation to maintain an action in another state against the alleged tort-feasor without pleading or proving the compensation law of the state of contract giving him subrogation rights even though the contract provides for subrogation.⁸⁰ In a suit by an employer for reimbursement for compensation paid to the employee brought against a third-person tort-feasor, it has been held that the employer must plead and prove that neither he nor his employee was guilty of negligence that was the proximate cause of the injury sustained by the employee.⁸¹ Under a statute, however, providing that, for subrogation purposes, any payment made to the injured employee by, or on behalf of, defendants shall be considered as having been so paid as damages resulting from, and because said injury was caused under circumstances creating a legal liability against, such defendants, authorizes recovery by insurer of full damages against defendants without allegation or proof of negligence on the part of defendants or freedom from contributory negligence on the part of the injured employee.⁸²

Under acts providing for subrogation, the issues involved relate to the tortious liability of defendant both in an action by the employer,⁸³ and in an action for the benefit of insurer.⁸⁴ Under some acts, in an action on behalf of an employer to recover from a third person compensation paid or payable, the question as to whether the employer carries insurance is not a relevant issue.⁸⁵ In an action by an employer for the benefit of insurer, brought pursuant to a provision that if compensation is paid the employer may enforce for his own benefit or that of insurer the liability of a third person, it has been held that the liability under the policy of insurer to pay the compensation which it has already paid may not be litigated.⁸⁶

Where, under the statute, in an action in the name of the employee for the benefit of insurer the liability of defendant, including liability in respect of the amount recoverable, is the same as in an action for the benefit of the employee, evidence of payment of compensation in compliance with the act is unnecessary.⁸⁷ Where the right of the employer to maintain an action against a third person under a provision for subrogation is recognized notwithstanding compensation is being paid by insurer, as discussed supra § 1016, proof that compensation is being paid by insurer whereas the employer's petition alleges that compensation is being paid by the employer does not constitute a failure of proof sufficient to support a recovery,⁸⁸ and the variance is not, therefore, fatal.⁸⁹

§ 1027. Evidence

Specific matters with respect to evidence in actions by employees against third persons are discussed infra §§ 1028-1030. Questions of evidence with respect to an election of remedies by an employee or his dependents or beneficiaries are considered supra § 990.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 1028. — Presumptions and Burden of Proof

- a. Action on behalf of employee, his dependents, or beneficiaries
- b. Action on behalf of employer or insurer

a. Action on Behalf of Employee, His Dependents, or Beneficiaries

General rules as to presumptions in tort and death actions apply in actions by an employee or his beneficiaries against a tort-feasor for injuries or death. The burden of proof in such actions is on the plaintiff to prove his right to recover, and is on the defendant to prove matters of defense.

General rules as to presumptions and burden of proof in a tort or death action apply in an action on behalf of an employee or his dependents or beneficiaries against a tort-feasor for injury or death, prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a workmen's compensation act.⁹⁰ In an action against a general contractor, a judgment for compensation against a sub-contractor, who was the employee's employer, is presumed to have been in full satisfaction of the employee's industrial injuries.⁹¹

In the absence of evidence that an employee and his employer had given notice of nonacceptance of the compensation act, it is presumed that both were bound by the act.⁹² A presumption, under a provision of the compensation act, that a deceased employee and his employer were bound by the act, has apparently been given effect in an action by the personal representative for the death of such employee,⁹³ and where defendant seeks to avoid liability to an employee of another, under provisions of the act, on the ground that plaintiff, his employer, and defendant were all bound by the act, as considered supra § 985, and the evidence shows that the employee, his employer, and defendant are engaged in businesses which presumptively bring them under the act, such presumption is applicable in the action by the employee.⁹⁴ The fact, however, that the employer of plaintiff engages in some occupations which are within the compensation act does not of itself raise a presumption that plaintiff was engaged in an occupation within the act, where such employer also engages in occupations not within the act.⁹⁵

In general, defendant has the burden of proving facts on which it predicates a claim to immunity from a suit for damages,⁹⁶ and of proving defenses which arise under the compensation act.⁹⁷ So, defendant has the burden of proving compliance by the employer with the provisions of the act where non-compliance would permit the action,⁹⁸ the transfer of the cause of action to the employer,⁹⁹ assignment of the cause of action to insurer under the compensation act of another state,¹ plaintiff's status as an employee of defendant,² and defendant's liability for compensation under the act.³

Also, defendant has the burden of proving the allegations of a special plea setting up the claim that defendant and the employer of plaintiff employee were under the compensation act,⁴ that the employee was within the act,⁵ and that the injury or death arose out of, and in the course of, the employment.⁶

Defendant has the burden of proving the allegations of a special defense that the employee was employed by a subcontractor of defendant and that defendant is liable, if at all, only under the compensation act, and is not liable in an action at law for damages.⁷

A defendant who claims immunity from suit by an employee, by reason of the fact that defendant and plaintiff's employer were engaged on the premises where plaintiff was injured, which were under the joint supervision and control of defendant and the employer, has the burden of establishing these facts.⁸ Where defendant claims immunity on the basis that he and the employer were engaged on the premises in furtherance of a common enterprise, or the accomplishment of it, or related purposes in operation, he must prove those facts,⁹ as well as the facts as to the extent of the premises involved in such joint enterprise.¹⁰

An employee may be required to prove his freedom from contributory negligence,¹¹ and to prove the actionable negligence of the tort-feasor.¹² Under a statute authorizing the maintenance of a suit for damages against a person other than the employer, the employee must show that defendant was such a person.¹³

Plaintiff does not have the burden of proving, as a defense to a common-law action for damages, that he was not under the act,¹⁴ or that he was not acting in the course of his employment.¹⁵

Where the fact that defendant was not bound by the act is essential to plaintiff's right to recover, if the proof shows that plaintiff employee was bound by the act and that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment and the pleadings and evidence show that defendant was engaged in a business which brought defendant within the provisions of the act, the view has been taken that plaintiff must prove that defendant was not bound by the act;¹⁶ and, where there is a presumption, based on the business in which defendant is engaged, that defendant is under the act, plaintiff must prove a due rejection of the act by defendant where the act permits such rejection.¹⁷

In an action by the employee, prosecuted, as authorized by an act, on the employer's or insurer's failure to sue to enforce the liability of the third-person wrongdoer under the right of subrogation given by the act, plaintiff employee need not prove the essentials, prescribed by the act, of his right to sue,¹⁸ or a waiver by the employer of the subrogated right to sue.¹⁹

The employee has been held required to establish the loss of wages suffered as a result of the acts causing his injury.²⁰

Where an employee's personal representative seeks recovery, under a statute of a particular state, on the theory that the contract of employment was entered into therein, it is necessary that plaintiff prove that fact.²¹

ployee, that a defendant who claims the benefit of a provision of the compensation act applicable to a third person subject to the act is or is not subject to the act.²²

Burden of going forward with evidence. In a negligence action, a tort-feasor does not have the burden of establishing that the action was brought under the compensation act, and not under the common law, until after plaintiff, who sues under the common law, has made out a prima facie case of liability on the legal principles relied on in the declaration.²³

b. Action on Behalf of Employer or Insurer

General rules as to presumptions in tort or death actions apply in an action by an employer or insurer to recover for injuries to, or the death of, an employee. In such action, the plaintiff may be required to prove the negligence of the tort-feasor.

In an action by, or on behalf of, an employer or an insurer against a person other than the employer for an injury to, or the death of, an employee, there is a presumption that the employer complied with the provisions of the act, if that question is involved.²⁴ In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is presumed that a tort-feasor who is an employer is subject to the compensation law.²⁵

The conclusive presumption created by a compensation act that an employer engaged in certain employments or occupations has elected to be bound by the act unless he gives notice of an intention to the contrary applies to a defendant in an action by an employer against a third person,²⁶ and also to plaintiff in such action.²⁷ A presumption has been held to exist that the lineal kin of a deceased employee sustained actual damages by reason of his death.²⁸

In an action by, or on behalf of, an employer or insurer against a person other than the employer for an injury to, or the death of, an employee, the employer or insurer may be required to show that the circumstances causing the death or injury occurred in the course of his employment.²⁹ The view has been taken that, in an action by an employee against a third person, proof of payment of compensation is not part of plaintiff's case, even though the action is actually brought for the benefit of insurer whose right to bring the action depends, under the compensation act, on the payment of compensation.³⁰ Although it has been held that an employer is not required to prove the payment of compensation, it being sufficient to offer a record of the proceeding before the commission to show the acceptance of compensation,³¹ proof of payment has been held necessary where insurer brings the action.³²

Waiver of right to subrogation. In an action by an employer under his right of subrogation given by the compensation act, proof of nonwaiver of the employer's right of subrogation is not necessary;³³ waiver of the employer's right of subrogation is a matter of defense, with the burden on defendant to prove it.³⁴

Actionable wrong, contributory negligence, and damages. In an action by, or on behalf of, an employer or insurer against a tort-feasor for an injury to, or the death of, an employee, a particular state of facts has been held to create a presumption of negligence on the part of the tort-feasor,³⁵ as well as to authorize the application of the maxim of res ipsa loquitur.³⁶ However, where the instrumentality causing the harm was not under the exclusive control of the tort-feasor,³⁷ or evidence of specific negligence is introduced into the case,³⁸ the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is inapplicable.

In an action by an employer to recover from a third person, it is for plaintiff to prove all the essential elements of the cause of action which the injured employee would have been called on to prove if his right of action had not been transferred to the employer.³⁹ Thus, plaintiff may be required to prove that defendant was in fact a wrongdoer,⁴⁰ facts creating a legal liability of defendant,⁴¹ and the resulting damages.⁴²

Also, in an action by the employer to recover the amount paid as compensation to an injured employee, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to show affirmatively that defendant was guilty of the negligence charged,⁴³ and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.⁴⁴

The employer may also be required to show the employee's freedom from contributory negligence,⁴⁵ that just prior to, and at the time of, such injury the employee was in the exercise of ordinary care for his own safety,⁴⁶ that, at the time and place of the injury, the employer was exercising reasonable care for the safety of his employees,⁴⁷ or that the injuries for which compensation was paid were not proximately caused by the negligence of the employer or his employees.⁴⁸ A statutory provision that, on the trial of an action to recover damages for causing death, the contributory negligence of the person killed shall be a defense to be proved by defendant has been applied in an action by an insurer against a third person based on the death of an employee so as to impose on defendant the burden of proving the contributory negligence of the deceased employee.⁴⁹

The employer may also be required to prove the fixed amount of compensation that he must pay.⁵⁰ Since lineal kin are presumed to have sustained actual damage by an employee's death, an employer need not prove pecuniary loss to next of kin where the compensation was paid to one of such lineal kin.⁵¹

§ 1029. — Admissibility

- a. Action on behalf of employee, his dependents, or beneficiaries
- b. Action on behalf of employer or insurer

a. Action on Behalf of Employee, His Dependents, or Beneficiaries

In an action by an employee or his beneficiaries against a tort-feasor, evidence relating to compensation is generally not admissible.

General rules as to the admissibility of evidence applicable in actions based on torts or death apply in actions by an employee, or the dependents or personal representative of a deceased employee, for injury or death, prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a workmen's compensation act.⁵² In such

52. Evidence held admissible or improperly excluded

(1) Generally.

U.S.—Johnson v. Sword Line, Inc., C. A.Pa., 240 F.2d 954.

(2) Testimony that destination of railroad car was out of state was admissible to prove interstate character of train movement and to establish that rights of parties were not governed by state compensation act, particularly where railroad company an action, where plaintiff is entitled to sue and to recover the full amount of damages notwithstanding there has been an award or payment of damages, only where the existence of compensation insurance is relevant to a material issue may it be considered by the jury;⁵³ accordingly, evidence is not admissible on behalf of defendant to show that plaintiff may secure compensation if the negligence action is unsuccessful.⁵⁴

Also inadmissible on behalf of defendant is evidence as to the fact of compensation,⁵⁵ or as to the compensation proceedings.⁵⁶ Other evidence relating to compensation which has been held inadmissible on behalf of defendant is evidence as to an agreement therefor,⁵⁷ as to the refusal or allowance of a claim therefor,⁵⁸ as to the receipt or acceptance thereof,⁵⁹ and as to the amount of the compensation received.⁶⁰ Similarly, evidence as to compensation has been held inadmissible on behalf of other parties to the action.⁶¹

Also, the file of papers which were used in the compensation proceedings may not be admitted at defendant's insistence where they are not material to the issues.⁶² Even in jurisdictions in which the compensation which plaintiff has received from the employer of the injured employee may be deducted from the amount of damages recoverable, as considered infra § 1040, the right of defendant to introduce at the trial evidence as to compensation paid has been denied,⁶³ but there is apparently authority to the contrary.⁶⁴

On the other hand, where evidence as to a claim for,⁶⁵ or payment of,⁶⁶ compensation is necessary for the jury properly to evaluate the testimony of a witness, it is admissible. Also, evidence as to the receipt of compensation may be admissible subject to the limitation that it be considered only on the question of whether plaintiff, therefore unnecessarily extended the period of his inactivity.⁶⁷

Furthermore, evidence as to the acceptance or rejection of a compensation act by the employer and his employees has been held to be admissible.⁶⁸

Defendants may properly show that plaintiff's physicians have been paid,⁶⁹ or that payments have been made by or for his employer because of the wages lost during his disability.⁷⁰

Findings, order, or judgment in compensation proceedings. The admissibility, on behalf of defendant, of the findings and order by the state compensation commissioner in a proceeding to which the employee who is plaintiff in the present action was a party has been denied,⁷¹ as has the admissibility of a judgment for dependents for compensation for the death of an employee, under the act, in an action by the personal representative in an action against a third-person wrongdoer for such death.⁷²

Payment of expenses. Evidence that the dependents of a deceased employee did not pay his medical and funeral expenses is properly excluded.⁷³

Employee's earning capacity. The admission, contrary to statute, of testimony as to plaintiff's earning capacity, after the introduction of evidence as to the amount of medical expenses and compensation paid by an insurance carrier, is not error where the record discloses that the parties had stipulated that the compensation fund had paid certain compensation and medical expenses, and there is no showing that the stipulation was made solely for the purpose of fixing the amount of insurer's lien in case judgment is for plaintiff.⁷⁴

b. Action on Behalf of Employer or Insurer

In an action by an employer or insurer against a tort-feasor to recover for injuries to, or the death of, an employee, any relevant evidence is admissible which bears on the existence of liability on the part of the tort-feasor.

In general, in an action by or for the benefit of an employer or insurer against a third person liable for an injury to, or the death of, an employee, any relevant evidence is admissible which bears on the existence of an actionable wrong, or of responsibility for the injury to, or death of, the employee, on the part of defendant,⁷⁵ or on the question as to the negligence of plaintiff employer, where such negligence would defeat recovery.⁷⁶

Existence of insurance. Where the employer is, under the governing act, authorized to bring an action in his own name, even though he carries insurance, in an action by an employer against a third person who has elected to be bound by the act, the exclusion of evidence offered by defendant that the employer was insured⁷⁷ and that the insurance company paid to the personal representative of a deceased employee all compensation that was paid⁷⁸ has been upheld. Where, however, the right of an insurer to appear as plaintiff depends on its being the insurance carrier of the employer of the injured employee, the policy of insurance issued by plaintiff insurer to the employer is admissible on behalf of plaintiff insurer.⁷⁹

Compensation proceedings, award, or payment, and employer's liability. Evidence as to the receipt of compensation by a deceased employee's dependents is admissible on behalf of a compensation insurer in order to prove an allegation of the complaint that the carrier was paying compensation.⁸⁰ The compensation agreement between the employer and a dependent, approved by the industrial board under the compensation act and having the effect of an award, is admissible on behalf of plaintiff on the issue as to whether an award had been made⁸¹ and as to the amount of the award.⁸² In an action by the employer against a third person to recover the amount of compensation paid, the order of the state industrial board allowing an award has been held to be properly admitted as the best evidence of the amount awarded;⁸³ but where, under the compensation act, the damages recoverable by the employer are not necessarily the same as, but are limited by, the amount of compensation paid and payable, the award of compensation by the industrial commission is admissible, not to prove damages or to fix the amount to be recovered,⁸⁴ but to establish a limit to the recovery.⁸⁵

Under a statute so providing, in an action by an employer alone, evidence of any expenditure which the employer has paid, or has become obligated to pay, by reason of an injury to, or the death of, an employee is admissible,⁸⁶ and the provision is applicable in an action by an insurer where, by the compensation act, insurer is subrogated to the rights of the employer.⁸⁷ The view has been taken, however, that, in an action in the name of an employee for the benefit of insurer, evidence on behalf of defendant tending to show payment of compensation to the employee is properly excluded,⁸⁸ notwithstanding the act provides that the employee may not proceed both for compensation and damages and that if compensation is paid insurer may enforce the liability of the third person in the name of the employee or in its own name.⁸⁹ Findings of the industrial commission in a proceeding on the claim of the employee for compensation have, however, been regarded as admissible on behalf of insurer in an action by it against a third person on questions as to the making, allowance, and payment, of a claim for compensation, where such facts are in issue under the pleadings.⁹⁰

Where a compensation insurer establishes a prima facie case, entitling it to recover from the tortfeasor, by introducing the award of compensation and a judgment recovered by the employee's personal representative against the tortfeasor, the latter may use the minutes of the trial of the representative's action, which were in evidence for another purpose, for the purpose of destroying the presumption of the validity of the award.⁹¹

In an action by an employer, the propriety of admitting evidence on behalf of plaintiff of the extent of disability suffered by the employee,⁹² and evidence which tends to fix the employer's liability under the compensation act⁹³ has apparently been recognized.

Evidence of things which an employee was required to do before compensation was paid have no relevancy to the issues in a suit by an insurer.⁹⁴

Waiver of objections. Where a party procures the giving of an instruction to the effect that the facts stated in exhibits introduced by the opposing party are not evidence of the existence of the stated facts, he waives his objections to the admission of the exhibits.⁹⁵

§ 1030. — Weight and Sufficiency

- a. In general
- b. Negligence or fault; assumption of risk

a. In General

General rules as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence have been applied in actions against a tortfeasor for injuries to, or the death of, an employee.

General rules as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence in tort or death actions apply in actions for injuries to, or the death of, an employee, prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a workmen's compensation act.⁹⁶ A party invoking the subrogation provision of a compensation act as a defense to a wrongful death action must maintain such defense by a preponderance of the evidence.⁹⁷ The right of recovery of an intervening insurance

Where there was in evidence an assignment between insurer and beneficiaries whereby they were to receive half of amount recovered against tortfeasor, and it was not shown that jury was unable to weigh properly any of insurer's evidence because jury was not informed of its true interest, exclusion of copy of lump sum payment receipt executed by beneficiaries in favor of insurer in satisfaction of its liability to beneficiaries under compensation act was not error.

company depends on the same degree of proof as the right of the employee to recover.⁹⁸

In an action by an insurer against a third person, findings made by the industrial board on a claim for compensation are prima facie proof of the making, allowance, and payment of a claim for compensation,⁹⁹ but are not conclusive on the question of the liability of defendant.¹

Where a provision of the compensation act giving the employer the right to enforce the liability of the person causing the injury if compensation is paid is regarded as a provision merely for indemnification, in an action by an employer pursuant to such provision, proof of compensation paid by plaintiff to the employee under the act, either by agreement of the parties, approved by the state industrial accident board,² or by order of the board under, and as provided for, in the act,³ is prima facie evidence of plaintiff's damages. Under such circumstances, defendant is at liberty to meet and overcome such evidence by any competent evidence⁴ showing that the amount is unreasonable,⁵ was not paid under, or in accordance with, the act,⁶ or was neither approved nor authorized by the board.⁷ Defendant has the right to contest the facts, adduced by plaintiff, relating to the legal liability of defendant and the resulting damages.⁸

The evidence has been held sufficient⁹ or insufficient¹⁰ to show various matters, to establish particular defenses,¹¹ and to raise particular inferences.¹²

So, the evidence has been held sufficient or insufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff,¹³ to warrant judgment for plaintiff,¹⁴ to warrant recovery by a compensation insurer,¹⁵ to sustain a determination in favor of defendant,¹⁶ or to sustain a judgment dismissing an action by a compensation insurer.¹⁷

17. Evidence held sufficient

La.—Ettna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Carabon, App., 11 So.2d 118.

Evidence has been held sufficient or insufficient to show that defendant is liable for the acts of his employees causing the injury,¹⁸ to establish the cause of the employee's death,¹⁹ to show that plaintiff and defendant, or defendant's decedent, were,²⁰ or were not,²¹ in the same employ at the time the cause of action arose, or to support a finding that a settlement between an employee and the tort-feasor was made without the employer's consent.²²

Similarly, the evidence has been held sufficient or insufficient to show the length of time of the employee's total disability,²³ the seaworthiness of a vessel,²⁴ that the employee was engaged in interstate commerce so as not to be subject to a state compensation law,²⁵ and that wages paid to injured employees were gratuities, and were not made because of any contractual obligation.²⁶

Evidence has also been held sufficient or insufficient to support a finding that plaintiff was acting within the scope and course of his employment at the time of the accident,²⁷ to establish that plaintiff was not an employee within the compensation act,²⁸ to establish that plaintiff was an independent contractor at the time of the injury,²⁹ to sustain a finding that defendant was a general contractor and that the deceased employee's immediate employer was a subcontractor,³⁰ or that work being done by an injured employee was merely ancillary to the business of his employer,³¹ to prove that plaintiff was a borrowed servant when the injuries were sustained,³² or that defendant was a special employer at that time,³³ or to support a finding that plaintiff was an employee of his regular employer,³⁴ or that plaintiff had not become an employee of defendant, but remained an employee of the regular employer exclusively.³⁵

Under a particular statute, if an employee was an ordinary invitee on the premises of the tort-feasor at the time he met his death, his dependents would have a prima facie case based on such facts, in an action against the tort-feasor.³⁶

Evidence has been held to establish that a contract of employment entered into by a deceased employee and a foreign corporation was entered into in the state of the forum, and not in the foreign jurisdiction, so as to be governed by the law of the forum.³⁷ Where plaintiff employer is engaged in an occupation which the compensation act makes subject to the act unless he has made an election to the contrary, proof that neither such employer nor the injured employee elected not to be bound by the act is sufficient to show their election to be bound by the act.³⁸

Where defendant, in an action by relatives of a deceased employee, submitted a prayer to the jury to consider the damages of some of these relatives, thereby assuming that a finding of dependency by the compensation commission, which is in evidence, is sufficient evidence thereof, the evidence is sufficient to establish dependency, even though defendant was not privy, or a party, to the compensation proceedings.³⁹ Uncontradicted evidence of amounts paid to the injured employee has been regarded as sufficient in an action by insurer to recover amounts paid.⁴⁰

Reasonableness of payments for medical, hospital, and nursing services. In an action by an insurer, the amount paid by it for medical, hospital, and nursing is some evidence of the reasonable value of such services.⁴¹ However, the evidence in such an action has been held to be insufficient to establish the fair value of the medical treatment rendered to the injured employee.⁴²

b. Negligence or Fault; Assumption of Risk

General rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence as to negligence have been applied in actions to recover for injuries to, or the death of, employees.

In actions against a tort-feasor to recover for injuries to, or the death of, an employee, the evidence has been held sufficient or insufficient to show various matters involving negligence,⁴³ such as negligence on the part of defendant,⁴⁴ the absence of negligence on the part of defendant,⁴⁵ the negligence of defendant's employee,⁴⁶ that the negligence was the proximate cause of the accident,⁴⁷ or that the negligence was a substantial factor in causing the injury.⁴⁸

In other decisions, the evidence has been held sufficient or insufficient to show contributory negligence on the part of the employee,⁴⁹ the absence of contributory negligence,⁵⁰ the exercise by the employee of due care at the time of the injury,⁵¹ the failure of the employee to avail himself of the safeguards provided,⁵² and the absence of assumption of the risk.⁵³

Likewise, in particular cases, the evidence has been held sufficient or insufficient to show the negligence of the employer,⁵⁴ the absence of negligence on his part,⁵⁵ or his freedom from fault,⁵⁶ or to overcome a presumption, arising from lack of eye-witnesses to the accident, that the employee was free from contributory negligence.⁵⁷ The fact that the record in an action against an alleged tort-feasor conclusively shows that he was guilty of negligence does not necessarily establish that the injury complained about was not caused by the joint, concurrent, or combined negligence of plaintiff's employer or its employees and the tort-feasor.⁵⁸

§ 1031. Trial in General

- a. In general
- b. Instructions

a. In General

In actions against a tort-feasor for an employee's injuries, matters relating to compensation, such as an award, or settlement of a claim and payment thereunder, should not ordinarily be discussed before the jury, but the existence of compensation insurance may be discussed where it is relevant to a material issue. Matters relating to a trial preference in such cases have been adjudicated.

The existence of compensation insurance may be discussed in the argument to the jury, in an action at law to recover damages for injuries to an employee, only where it is relevant to a material issue.⁵⁹ In an injured employee's action against a tort-feasor, requiring defendant to refrain from allying to plaintiff's settlement of a compensation claim, and the payments thereunder, is not erroneous,⁶⁰ and it is erroneous for any pleadings relating to compensation to be brought before the jury.⁶¹ The refusal to permit defendant's attorney to state to the jury the amount of a compensation award which could be made for plaintiff's injury is not

Where suit is brought in the name of a deceased employee's administratrix by a compensation insurer, and the named plaintiff has a substantial interest in the recovery sued for, she is entitled to have her counsel participate in the trial.⁶³ Where there is a direct conflict between the affidavits of the opposing parties on a motion to dismiss a complaint, and it is not possible to determine which one is correct, plaintiff is entitled to a trial of the issues raised in the affidavits.⁶⁴

Trial preference. A statutory provision giving a trial preference to an injured employee who elects to sue the tort-feasor has been held to be not inconsistent with other laws,⁶⁵ and has been held not to have been repealed by implication by another statute providing that the employee need not elect whether he will take compensation or pursue his remedy against the tort-feasor.⁶⁶ The commencement of an action against the tort-feasor is a sufficient election within the statute providing for trial preferences.⁶⁷

In an action to recover for injuries to, or the death of, an employee, the instructions should correctly and fully state the law, should be confined to the issues raised, and should not invade the jury's province.

General rules governing instructions in actions for tort or death apply in an action against a person other than the employer, who caused injury to, or the death of, an employee, on behalf of an employer or insurer, or of an employee or his dependents or beneficiaries.⁶⁸ The instructions should correctly and fully state the law applicable to the case,⁶⁹ and these instructions should include the

Deduction of compensation received

(1) In workman's action against third-party defendant, wherein insurer intervened, instruction that jury could deduct amount of compensation received from judgment awarded plaintiff against third party was erroneous and inadequate, in that, if instruction was carried out and insurer collected out of judgment, plaintiff would be paying back compensation twice.

Pa.—Collins, U. S. Cas. Intervener, v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 56 A.2d 236, 358 Pa. 168.

(2) It is better that jurors be fully instructed that workman should be fully compensated according to rules for ascertaining damages without regard to compensation received, since insurer who paid compensation will be reimbursed out of judgment, than that jurors, knowing that workman received some compensation, but not knowing, or being uncertain as to, law applicable, should be left to speculate as to effect of their verdict.

Cal.—Sherrillo v. Stone & Webster Engineering Corp., 244 P.2d 70, 110 C.A.2d 785.

(3) Plaintiff would have been entitled to instruction, if so requested, that insurer had paid compensation to plaintiff, that carrier had first lien on any judgment recovered, and that therefore jury in assessing damages should not deduct any amounts received by plaintiff from insurer.

submitting an issue in the case to the jury may be erroneous.⁸⁴ A requested instruction which was not in perfect form has been held to be sufficient to call the attention of the court to its failure to inform the jury that plaintiff could not recover if his injuries were due solely to the negligence of one or more of his fellow employees.⁸⁵

§ 1032. Questions of Law or Fact and Right to Jury Trial

- a. Action on behalf of employee, his dependents, or beneficiaries
- b. Action on behalf of employer or insurer

a. Action on Behalf of Employee, His Dependents, or Beneficiaries

In an action by an employee or his dependents for injuries or death, questions of fact arise where the evidence is conflicting, and questions of law arise where only one inference can reasonably be drawn from the evidence.

General rules as to what constitutes a question of law or fact, applicable in actions for torts or death, apply in actions on behalf of an employee or his dependents or beneficiaries for injuries or death, prosecuted notwithstanding the existence of a workmen's compensation act.⁸⁶ A question as to a particular matter is one of fact where the evidence is contradictory⁸⁷ or it is reasonable to draw different inferences therefrom.⁸⁸

Thus, it is a question for the trier of fact whether an employee has accepted compensation from his employer under the compensation act,⁸⁹ whether he was contributorily negligent,⁹⁰ whether the injuries complained of were caused by the negligence of a fellow employee,⁹¹ whether plaintiff was acting within the scope of his employment when the accident occurred,⁹² whether his injuries arose out of, and in the course of, employment which was a part of, or process in, the trade or business carried on by defendant, and not merely ancillary or incidental thereto,⁹³ and whether plaintiff was dependent on a deceased employee.⁹⁴

Where, however, the evidence is such that reasonable men can draw only one reasonable inference therefrom, the question is one of law for the court and is not a question for the jury.⁹⁵ So, where the evidence as to whether plaintiff was engaged in the course of his employment at the time of the accident is not in dispute, whether he is barred by the compensation act from maintaining an action against a tort-feasor is a question of law for the court.⁹⁶ Where affidavits, on a motion to dismiss a cause of action on the ground that plaintiff pursued his remedy under the compensation act, are conflicting on the question whether the injury arose out of, and in the course of, the employment, it is error for the court to dismiss the suit on such motion.⁹⁷ In an action by an employee, plaintiff's failure forthwith to notify the employer of the bringing of the action, pursuant to a provision of the compensation act, is not, it seems, ground for nonsuit, or for a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict for defendant.⁹⁸

In an action by an employer or insurer to recover for injuries to, or the death of, an employee, questions of fact on conflicting evidence are for the jury.

General rules as to what constitutes a question of law or fact applicable in actions for tort or for death apply in actions by, or on behalf of, an employer or insurer against a third person who caused the injury to, or the death of, an employee.⁹⁹ Where the evidence is conflicting as to a matter in issue,¹ or different inferences may be drawn from the evidence,² the question is one of fact for the jury.

Thus, it is a question of fact for the jury whether defendant³ or his employee⁴ was negligent, whether the injured employee was contributorily negligent,⁵ whether he was exercising due care for his safety before, and at the time of, the accident,⁶ whether the employer or his other employees were negligent,⁷ whether the negligence of the employer contributed proximately to the employee's injuries,⁸ whether the relationship of respondeat superior existed between defendant and the person causing the injury,⁹ and whether the employer furnished the employee with reasonably safe equipment and place to work.¹⁰ Also, it is a question of fact whether the tort-feasor had re-entered his employer's business and was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident.¹¹

Where, however, the evidence is of such a nature that there can be only one deduction or inference from the evidence and reasonable minds could not honestly have reached a different conclusion, the question is one of law,¹² and in such case it is proper to grant a motion for a nonsuit.¹³

Where there is insufficient evidence for the jury on the question of defendant's negligence,¹⁴ or a total absence of proof, or any inference of proof, that would justify a verdict against defendant,¹⁵ a directed verdict for defendant is proper; and where there is no proof that defendant was negligent, an instructed verdict for defendant is proper.¹⁶

Authority of employer or insurer to prosecute action. Under some acts, the authority of an employer or an insurer to prosecute an action against a tort-feasor is a preliminary question to be heard and determined by the judge,¹⁷ and is not a matter for the consideration of the jury.¹⁸ So, where there is nothing in the record to show that an employee's dependent had accepted compensation under an award, a directed verdict against an employer on its cause of action is justified.¹⁹

Jury trial. The right of defendant to a jury trial as to the facts essential to uphold an award of compensation, in an action by an employer as statutory assignee of a cause of action for the death of an employee, has been recognized.²⁰

§ 1033. Verdict and Findings

General rules as to findings and verdicts have been applied in actions against tort-feasors to recover for injuries to, or the death of, employees.

In order for an employer to recover medical expenses incurred in the treatment of an injured employee, there must be a finding that the accident was caused solely by reason of the negligence of defendant without any contributing negligence on the part of the employer.²¹ In an action by an oil company employee for injuries incurred when he, at the request of a driver of a truck, engaged by the oil company, did some work on the truck, a finding that plaintiff was an employee of the oil company acting within the scope and course of his employment established that, in helping the driver, he rendered services in furtherance of the business of his employer and not as a mere volunteer.²² A finding by a trial court that an employee was on the premises of the tort-feasor to inspect and service machinery sold to the tort-feasor by his employer is insufficient as a finding that the employee was in the course of his employment at the time of the accident.²³

In applying the general rules that findings are to be liberally construed in support of the judgment and that all findings are to be read and considered together and reconciled, if possible, to prevent conflict on material points, in an action by an insurer in which there has been a judgment for defendant, findings as to the negligence of the injured employee and of defendant have been construed and reconciled.²⁴

Under a particular compensation act, the verdict of the jury is required to declare the full amount of the damages suffered by plaintiff, notwithstanding any award or payment of compensation to him.²⁵ A general verdict for an injured employee and the employer has been held to be consistent with a joint count of the complaint, and to determine that both parties plaintiff are entitled to recover the sum awarded thereby.²⁶ In an action by an injured employee against a tort-feasor, wherein the employer intervened, a verdict providing for a recovery for the employee and for the employer has been held to be correctly interpreted as providing for a total of both amounts of recovery, rather than for a maximum of the amount awarded to the employee.²⁷

Under a particular statute, a special verdict is required on the issue of special damages for medical expenses, in an action by an employee against a tort-feasor.²⁸

feasors to recover for injuries to, or the death of, employees.

Under particular statutory provisions, when a verdict has been recovered by a compensated employee against a tort-feasor, the court, sitting without a jury, determines the amount of compensation paid or payable to the employee and then enters a judgment safeguarding the rights of any person entitled to share in the recovery, regardless of whether or not such person is a party to the action.²⁹ Where plaintiff cannot be subject to a nonsuit because he made out a prima facie case of liability on the part of defendant, and judgment cannot be granted to plaintiff because defendant was precluded from rebutting plaintiff's prima facie case, neither party is entitled to a judgment on the merits.³⁰ Notwithstanding a provision for subrogation if the employee or his dependents elect to receive compensation and the fact that dependents did so elect, the right of the employer and insurer to recover in an action by the personal representative of a deceased employee against a person liable other than the employer has been denied where neither the employer nor insurer was a party to the action and the personal representative had no right to sue.³¹

So, also, an employer who has failed properly to serve its intervention petition on defendants in an action by the parents of a deceased employee is not entitled to judgment against defendant,³² but may be entitled to reimbursement out of the judgment awarded to the parents as considered infra § 1041. An employer who has properly intervened in an action by an employee against a tort-feasor to recover compensation paid to the employee, as well as other expenses, is entitled to a direct judgment against the tort-feasor, rather than to mere reimbursement out of the judgment for the employee.³³ Where an employer intervenes, in an employee's action against a tort-feasor, for reimbursement of compensation paid to the employee, separate judgments may be rendered against the tort-

feasor in favor of the employee and the employer.³⁴

Where an employee is not a party to his employer's action against a tort-feasor to recover compensation paid or payable, the court has no power to diminish the rights that the employee has received under a compensation award by terminating the employer's obligation to the employee.³⁵ In an action by the personal representative of an employee, the trial court may require plaintiff to secure defendant from the possibility of a claim by employer or insurer as a condition precedent to the payment of the judgment.³⁶

Any recovery by an employee against a tort-feasor forecloses the employee's right against the latter.³⁷ Similarly, an adjudication in an action by an insurer against a tort-feasor for an employee's death is binding on the employee's dependents, even though they were not parties to the action.³⁸

Default judgment. Where a compensation insurer intervenes in a compensated employee's action against a tort-feasor after the entry of judgment for the employee, and the tort-feasor satisfies the judgment before the entry of a default judgment on the complaint in intervention, insurer is not entitled to a correction of the default judgment to show that it is entered against the tort-feasor instead of the employee, since, after the tort-feasor satisfied the judgment, recovered by the employee, no further judgment could be entered against him in favor of the employee or insurer.³⁹ Under such circumstances, where the prayer of the intervention complaint is for a judgment against the tort-feasor, the court is without power to enter a default judgment against the employee, since the relief given is limited to that requested in the demand for judgment.⁴⁰

Enforcement of judgment. Both the employee and the employer have an actual and enforceable interest in the judgment against a tort-feasor where it is in excess of the amount due the employer,⁴¹ and each has a right to enforce the collection of the judgment and the payment to him of the portion thereof legally belonging to him.⁴²

Suit in equity to restrain enforcement of judgment. In a suit in equity to restrain the enforcement of a judgment obtained by the personal representative of a deceased employee in an action by such representative against the complainant in such suit in equity, such complainant has the burden of establishing the facts which will entitle him to relief,⁴³ and must support his case by evidence which is properly admissible⁴⁴ and which is sufficient to warrant the granting of relief.⁴⁵

§ 1035. New Trial

Where an action for an employee's death is tried on an erroneous theory of damages, the court should not grant a new trial, but should reduce the verdict to an amount allowable under the compensation act.

Where, in an action by the personal representative for the death of an employee, the case is tried on the erroneous theory that a provision limiting the amount of damages and fixing such damages at the amount of compensation payable under the act does not apply, and the verdict establishes the liability of defendant for the death, the court, on being convinced of its error, should not grant a new trial, but should reduce the verdict to an amount allowable under the compensation act.⁴⁶

§ 1036. Appeal and Error

General rules governing questions of appeal and error in civil actions have been applied in actions to recover from a tort-feasor for injuries to, or the death of, an employee, as affected by workmen's compensation statutes.

General rules applicable to appeals in civil actions apply in an action by, on behalf of, an employee, his dependents, or beneficiaries, or by, or on behalf of, the employer or insurer, against a third-person tort-feasor, as affected by workmen's compensation statutes.⁴⁷ An order making an equitable distribution of a recovery against a tort-feasor is properly reviewable by appeal,⁴⁸ and cannot be reviewed by certiorari.⁴⁹

A judgment dismissing an action,⁵⁰ dismissing an amendment to an answer,⁵¹ or striking a portion of the answer containing an affirmative defense,⁵² has been held to be final and appealable. The refusal of a trial judge to vacate his order making an employer and its compensation insurer parties defendant to an action by an injured employee against a tort-feasor, which order violates the employee's exclusive privilege to prosecute the action without the presence of the employer and insurer as parties, is appealable, as it immediately affects a substantial right of the employee.⁵³

A party who is not aggrieved by a judgment of a trial court is not entitled to appeal therefrom.⁵⁴

Questions as to the sufficiency of the complaint may not be raised for the first time on appeal.⁵⁵ A general statement, in a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, that the complaint is insufficient does not raise specific defects for purposes of appeal.⁵⁶

Where the trial court construes the evidence, any reasonable construction of the effect of the evidence which supports the order of that court is binding on an appellate court.⁵⁷ Where the parties agree at the trial that proof of an issue is unnecessary, the question of lack of proof thereof may not be presented on appeal,⁵⁸ and the question of the right to bring the action, which is dependent on such proof, may not be questioned there.⁵⁹ A court will not reverse a judgment for error which was not raised in the trial court.⁶⁰

Questions of fact, in an action against a tortfeasor, are for the trial court in a case tried without a jury.⁶¹

Where a statute requires that an employer or its insurer shall have paid, or become liable to pay, compensation, before it can sue a tortfeasor, the proof of the pendency of an action by insurer against a tortfeasor does not require a reviewing court to find that there had been an acceptance of the award.⁶² A reviewing court will not consider the question whether a party is precluded from bringing an action by reason of its having received compensation, where it is questionable whether the issue was properly raised by the pleadings, and there is no showing that the party received compensation.⁶³ Where defendant contends that the denials of its motions for a directed verdict and for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict are error, a question of law is raised for the reviewing court whether, under the evidence and legal inferences considered most strongly in plaintiff's favor, defendant was guilty of negligence.⁶⁴

On appeal to the highest court of the jurisdiction from an intermediate reviewing court, the court will not determine whether a finding of the trial court is supported by the facts.⁶⁵

A reviewing court cannot make an assumption that a factory employs the number of workmen which makes its operation under the compensation act compulsory.⁶⁶

A verdict for plaintiff which is general in form must be upheld on appeal if it can be sustained by any court of the complaint.⁶⁷

Where an appeal is effected only by a deceased employee's personal representative from a judgment for him and the employer, and it is determined that the charge on damages was erroneous, the judgment will be set aside as to both parties in whose favor it was rendered.⁶⁸

An intervenor, who was entitled to a judgment in the trial court in accordance with its complaint, is entitled to a judgment in the reviewing court recognizing its preference and priority to money awarded to an injured employee.⁶⁹ A determination by an appellate court that a compensation commission lacks jurisdiction of a particular matter is not res judicata of a person's right to litigate the matter in a court of law.⁷⁰

Harmless or prejudicial error. Errors occurring during the trial and not affecting the outcome of the case are harmless errors.⁷¹ Matters occurring on the trial⁷² or on an intermediate appeal⁷³ which are prejudicial to a party constitute reversible error.

An error in admitting papers, which were part of a compensation proceeding, in an action by the employee against the tortfeasor, is not cured by an instruction relating to the subrogation rights of insurer who has paid compensation.⁷⁴ However, an argument to the jury that plaintiff will receive compensation was not prejudicial misconduct on the part of defendant's attorney, where the compensation insurer filed its lien for benefits paid, the jury was instructed not to consider the compensation insurance in determining the amount of damages to be awarded, and the court overruled a motion for a new trial based on the argument.⁷⁵

Remand. Where the record on review is inadequate to justify a particular holding, the case is remanded to the court to which the question at issue is primarily addressed.⁷⁶ Where a trial court dismissed a motion to implead, before any facts were developed, the appellate court need not remand the case for further proceedings on the motion, but may consider the findings which were made after such dismissal, in order to determine whether they preclude a successful prosecution of the claim on which the motion is based, thus affording a basis for sustaining the dismissal.⁷⁷

Duty to assess full damages

In an action in tort by an injured employee against tort-feasor, court of appeal could not consider compromise settlement of workmen's compensation by injured employee's employer, and only duty of the court was to assess against tort-feasor full and actual damages sustained by injured employee, where neither employer nor its insurance carrier paying workmen's compensation intervened.

La.—Ernst v. New Orleans Public Belt R. R., supra.

Segregation of items of damages

Where employee is injured in course of employment as result of negligence of third person, workmen's compensation act comprehends segregation of items of damages which employee is entitled to recover from third person, so as to prevent double recovery from third person.

or exemplary damages.⁸² The damages may be measured by the common-law standard of damages,⁸³ and the employee's recovery, it has been held, is limited to, and based on, the unliquidated damages which he has suffered.⁸⁴ An employee accepting a payment for his damages from the third-party tort-feasor extinguishes all right again to collect for the same injury from such person.⁸⁵

The amount of recovery is not limited to the amount of compensation awarded under the act,⁸⁶ especially where the third person is not a resident of the state of the injured employee's employment;⁸⁷

No defense to third person

(1) In action by injured employee against third person for injuries allegedly sustained through negligence of third person, fact that medical expenses were not paid by employee but by his employer on his behalf who would be entitled to subrogation would not constitute a defense to third person as to such expenditures.

Full compensation

In suit under longshoremen's compensation act against one whose negligence has caused injuries to an employee, measure of damages is such amount as will fairly compensate employee for his injuries, considering his pain and suffering, loss of time, extent of injuries, and whether employee was permanently or totally disabled, and amount paid out for doctors, nurses, medicines, and hospitalization, provided such expenses are shown to have been reasonable and necessary.

& Ins. Corp., C.C.A.Fla., 112 F.2d 684.

General principles of liability

Under statute with respect to recovery against third-party tort-feasor or by employee entitled to compensation, tort-feasor is liable only for damages, and such liability is not increased because employer is liable to employee for compensation, and monetary liability of tort-feasor is determined by principles applicable in fixing liability in tort actions, and when so determined, statute does not provide that in addition, tort-feasor is liable to employer for what employer may be liable for.

La.—Todd-Johnson Dry Docks v. City of New Orleans, App., 55 So. 2d 650.

Pecuniary loss

Damages to compensation claimant are measured by pecuniary loss which claimant has sustained, depending on relation in which claimant stood to decedent and pecuniary benefit which claimant would have properly received from decedent had he continued to live.

Ga.—Williams Bros. Lumber Co. v. Meisel, 88 S.E.2d 384, 85 Ga.App. 72.

Compensation statute contemplates that usually amount which would be awarded in tort damages would exceed amount which injured employee is entitled to in workmen's compensation; so, where employee's injuries had been properly assessed in workmen's compensation proceeding, his recovery against third-party tort-feasor would be limited to difference between what plaintiff could have earned, had he not been injured, and amount he was awarded in workmen's compensation proceeding plus a reasonable amount to compensate him for suffering.

nor does a provision for assignment operate to diminish the recovery against a third person by the amount of the compensation awarded under the act.⁸⁸ According to some cases, whether or not the employer or insurer is entitled to any part of the recovery is no concern of defendant.⁸⁹ The liability, however, is not to be broadened merely because the employer was liable to the employee for compensation.⁹⁰

Under the construction given some provisions, however, the employee or dependents are not entitled to recover full damages and defendant is entitled to a credit for compensation paid, as considered infra § 1040, but where the employer or insurer has intervened in an action by the employee or personal representative, the full damages are ascertained.⁹¹ In an action by the injured employee or a dependent against a third person, there are elements of recoverable damages which the state industrial accident commission may⁹² and may not⁹³ consider and fix in determining compensation. Likewise, in determining the amount of damages some facts should not be considered, such as that plaintiff is receiving compensation because of the injury for which he seeks recovery⁹⁴ and that the insurance carrier has filed a lien for compensation benefits paid,⁹⁵ or the amount received by the injured employee under so-called benefit plan.⁹⁶

Amount of compensation and damages. Some compensation laws do not contemplate a full double recovery by an injured employee in both tort and workmen's compensation,⁹⁷ and the right to recover an amount equal to the compensation paid or payable in addition to the amount of damages otherwise recoverable has been denied.⁹⁸ The liability of a passively negligent third person, however, is reduced by the amount of compensation received by the employee from the actively negligent employer or his insurance carrier,⁹⁹ and the amount recovered from the wrongdoer is limited to the excess of damages over the compensation collected.¹

Where, under a provision for assignment, the employer or insurer is entitled to recover from a third person only the amount which has duly been paid under the award, as discussed infra §§ 1039, 1041, an injured employee to whom his employer who has paid compensation assigns the cause of action acquired by the employer under the act may recover from the third person only the amount which the employer has been compelled to pay under the award.²

Excessive damages. General rules as to the excessiveness of damages in actions for personal injuries apply in an action for damages brought by an employee who has elected to pursue his remedy against a third person.³

Federal Employees' Compensation Act. It has been said that an employee of the United States who has received compensation under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act gains nothing as a result of a recovery from a third person liable for the injury in view of provisions of the act for payment of the amount recovered into the compensation fund or for crediting such recovery on future payments of compensation.⁴

§ 1039. — Action by or on Behalf of Employer or Insurer

Under some statutes the employer or insurer is entitled to recover the full amount of damages which the employee or dependents could recover, and the amount of compensation paid or payable is not the measure of damages; but the damages may be limited to an amount not in excess of compensation paid or payable by employer.

Where by a specific provision of the act the employee or the dependents of a deceased employee are, or may be, entitled to a share of the amount recovered from the third-person wrongdoer by the employer or insurer, it is usually held or recognized that the employer or insurer is entitled to recover the full amount of damages which the employee or dependents could recover⁵ including punitive dam-

Employer guilty of contributory negligence

Where employer's compensation insurer brought action against United States and War Shipping Administration as owners of steamship to establish third-party liability for negligence causing injury to employee and court found that em-ages,⁶ and that the amount of compensation paid or payable is not the measure of damages.⁷ A recovery by an insurer, however, in its own right and for the benefit of a personal representative of decedent in an action against the third person will bar any further recovery from defendant because of such death.⁸ Some acts which contain a provision for payment over of the excess recovered also contain an express provision permitting the recovery of any amount that the employee or his dependents would have recovered.⁹

Even where the act does not contain a provision giving the employee any potential or fixed interest in the recovery, according to some cases a provision that the awarding of compensation shall operate as an assignment of a cause of action against a third person is not a provision for indemnification only¹⁰ and the person liable for compensation succeeds to the entire cause of action of the employee or, with limitations, of the dependents of a deceased employee, as discussed supra § 996. Accordingly, the employer or insurer so acquiring the whole cause of action may recover those damages¹¹ and, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, those only,¹² which the employee, or, in event of the death of an employee, the personal representative, could have recovered in an action by him; the compensation paid or payable is not the measure of damages.¹³ employee's injury was due to concurrent negligence of shipowners and employer, admiralty rule of contribution between tort-feasors could be applied although employer was not a party to action; contribution between tort-feasors could not operate against amount recovered by insurer as trustee for injured employee but against only so much of recovery as equaled compensation paid by employer or insurer and other items of expense.

Likewise, a provision giving the employer the right to indemnity from the person liable and to subrogation to the rights of the employee has been so construed as to authorize the employer to recover all that the employee could recover, even in the absence of any specific provision for the disposal of the excess in such case.¹⁴ Where, on an employee's electing to take compensation, "all right" of the employee to recover from the wrongdoer was assigned to the employer, the employer is entitled to recover damages for the employee's pain and suffering up to the time of his death¹⁵ as well as for a diminished earning capacity.¹⁶

The view has been expressed, however, that under a provision for the assignment to insurer of a cause of action in case of election to take compensation, the carrier is limited in its recovery to the amount which it has been compelled to pay under the award of compensation,¹⁷ and even in the absence from the provision of any specific restrictive words as to amount, a provision giving the employer the right to enforce the liability of a third person, if compensation is paid, has been treated as a provision for indemnification only,¹⁸ so that the employer is not entitled to recover the damages which the injured employee might recover, but is limited to an amount not in excess of compensation paid in accordance with the act,¹⁹ or is limited to the employer's financial loss.²⁰ By the express terms of some acts, in an action by the employer expenditures which the employer has paid or has become obligated to pay by reason of an injury to, or death of, an employee are to be deemed a part of the damages, including a reasonable attorney's fee to be fixed by the court.²¹

Statute construed

Provision of compensation act authorizing recovery by employer for compensation awarded employee against person liable for employee's injury would be construed as limiting amount of damages recoverable to amount of compensation for which employer became liable, and not as substituting compensation award for usual measure of damages in tort actions.

Ind.—Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Stitzle, supra.

Where personal representative not party to suit

In employer's action against tort-feasor to recover compensation paid and payable to dependent of employee, where personal representative of employee was not a party, court properly adjudged that employer recover forthwith amount he had paid by way of compensation prior to date of trial and a weekly sum of damages continuing as long as employer was obligated to continue to pay that amount per week by virtue of compensation award, provided total sum of weekly payments and lump sum recovery did not exceed amount of verdict for employer.

Payment into state treasury

Action of employer under provision of compensation law giving employer or insurer, who is required to make payment into state treasury, a right of action against a third person for reimbursement for any sums so paid, if injury or death of employee was due to actionable act, neglect, or default of third person, is one for reimbursement for money paid out pursuant to statute and is not an action for damages to which comparative negligence statute applies.

the payment of all costs taxed against the employer in any legal proceeding defended by insurer, and all expenses incurred by the insurer, it cannot recover the expenses of appealing to the court from a subsequent insurer who was made primarily liable by the judgment appealed from.²³ Where an insurance carrier was required by the compensation law to pay a certain sum into special funds, he may recover such amounts from the tort-feasor, although a dependent had previously recovered from such tort-feasor for wrongful death.²⁴

An employer, whether self-insurer or otherwise, it has been held, cannot recover from any source any sum to reimburse an amount paid under the compensation law to the injured employee, whether the injury results from the negligence of some third person or otherwise.²⁵

Express limitation as to amount. Where the act provides that the employer may recover the damages sustained in an amount not exceeding the aggregate amount of compensation payable under the act by reason of injury or death of the employee, recovery is limited to the damages sustained which in no event can exceed the aggregate amount of compensation payable under the act,²⁶ and these damages include loss of time and other expenses.²⁷ A provision that the employer may collect from the person in whom the legal liability for damages exists the indemnity paid or payable to the injured employee authorizes the recovery by or for the employer of such damages as the injured employee could have recovered for the injury up to and not exceeding the amount of indemnity paid or payable by the employer.²⁸

Contemplation of excess recovery. A direction to the employer to pay over the excess to the employee or the dependents of a deceased employee does not contemplate that there should always be such excess in an action by the employer against a negligent third person.²⁹

Reimbursement of fund. Where an employee injured by a third person receives compensation from the state insurance fund and assigns to it his cause of action against the third person, it is entitled, in an action against the third person, to be reimbursed not only for what had been paid to the employee at the time of trial, but also for any additional sum it was legally obligated to pay.³⁰

Breach of warranty. The compensation payments made by an employer or insurer pursuant to the requirements of the compensation act are not recoverable by insurer in its action against a third person for breach of warranty.³¹

Legislative intent

Under compensation law, providing that if assignee recover from tort-feasor by judgment, settlement, or "otherwise" a sum in excess of total amount of compensation awarded to injured employee or dependents, assignee should pay to employee or dependents two thirds of excess, quoted word expresses legislative intent to leave assignee unhampered in method or means to be employed to effect purposes of statute.

Trust

Where injured employee, receiving weekly compensation, recovered judgment against third person, after deducting from judgment recovered, costs and one-third payable to employee and compensation paid to date, employee could be protected as to balance, which did not equal total liability of employer and insurer under compensation award, by directing payment thereof to insurer in trust for self reimbursement, or permitting such amount to remain in trust with clerk of court to be repaid to insurer as compensation payments were made.

Wis.—Richtman (American Mut. Liability Ins. Co.) v. Honkamp, 13 N. W.2d 597, 245 Wis. 68.

The amount recovered from the wrongdoer by the injured employee or by the personal representative of a deceased employee pursuant to a right of election given by some acts is not regarded as compensation under the act.³⁶ Where the insurance carrier is also the liability insurer of the wrongdoer and secures an order in an action for the death of the employee crediting the judgment with the compensation payments due and to become due, it is, on the death of the dependent before the compensation has been entirely paid, liable for the balance to the dependent's administrator, although the compensation act provides that compensation ceases on the death of the dependent.³⁷

Where a statutory assignment has become operative, the carrier is under no duty to prosecute against the third person, and has full authority to compromise and settle, even for a lesser amount than it has paid by way of compensation,³⁸ and the statute does not impose any limitation on this right by reason of the fact that a verdict or even a judgment has been secured.³⁹ The claim may also be settled for the amount of compensation paid,⁴⁰ and thus the right of the employee or his dependents to the excess damages above the compensation paid may be defeated.⁴¹ Where the assignment to the employer is not of the entire cause of action, as discussed supra § 996, a compromise between the tort-feasor and the employer can affect only the employer's rights,⁴² and cannot affect the tort-feasor's liability to the employee or his dependents above the amount of compensation received;⁴³ and the employer may not release the whole claim against the tort-feasor in advance on consideration that the employer shall be personally relieved from liability for compensation.⁴⁴

Accident benefits. Where an injured employee received compensation and an additional amount for accident benefits, but later recovered a judgment from the third person and reimbursed the commission for the total amount of compensation and accident benefits, the employee is not entitled to repayment by the commission of the amount of the award for accident benefits.⁴⁵

Agreement

A plaintiff, recovering judgment for wrongful death against decedent's employer and others on jury's verdict after such employer and fellow employee of decedent were brought in as additional defendants by original defendant, on scire facias, cannot recover entire amount of judgment from defendants other than employer while being paid compensation under workmen's compensation agreement with employer, but can collect from such other defendants only amount of judgment with interest, less amount paid under such agreement.

Pa.—Maio v. Fahs, 14 A.2d 105, 339 Pa. 180.

Consolidated action

Plaintiffs, who were injured as result of negligence of employee of gation or reimbursement of the employer or insurer, however, defendant wrongdoer is not entitled to have the amount of an allowance of compensation under the compensation act deducted from the amount recoverable in an action by an injured employee,⁴⁷ or by the personal representative of a deceased employee.⁴⁸

c. Amount of Compensation Paid or Payable

Under some statutes where a third-party tort-feasor is subject to the compensation act, the liability of such a person is limited to the amount of compensation paid.

A provision that, under certain circumstances, if the employee or the dependents of an employee shall bring an action for the recovery of damages against a person who is subject to the act, other than the employer, the amount thereof, manner in which, and the persons to whom the recovery are payable, shall be as provided in that part of the act which deals with the award of compensation, limits the amount of recovery;⁴⁹ the amount of damages⁵⁰ and the manner of payment⁵¹ are as provided in that part of the act which deals with the award of compensation. While a provision of this character must be construed fairly and broadly with a view to confer the benefits intended,⁵² the mere fact that a third person is an employer of labor is not sufficient to bring him within, and give him the protection of, the above statutory provision⁵³ so as to permit him to claim the benefit of the limited liability therein provided;⁵⁴ and in order to bring a case within the operation of such provision it must appear that the act complained of arose out of, or had some relation to, the business carried on by defendant.⁵⁵

Such a provision applies only where the third person is also subject to the compensation act,⁵⁶ and a person who is an officer of a corporation subject to the act but who occasioned the injury involved while acting entirely in a private capacity cannot take advantage of the provision.⁵⁷ It is not necessary, however, that defendant should be an employer in order that the provision may apply,⁵⁸ and, if otherwise applicable, the provision applies where plaintiff and defendant are employees of the same employer.⁵⁹

d. Distribution among Dependents or Next of Kin

Where the cause of action for the death of an employee is regarded as one for the benefit of the next of kin as defined by the general statute applicable to death actions, the distribution of the amount recovered is made in accordance with such general statute.

Where the cause of action for the death of an employee is regarded as one for the benefit of next of kin as defined by the general statute applicable to death actions, as discussed supra § 964, the distribution of the amount recovered is made in accordance with such general statute.⁶⁰ Where, howdefendant, and who received from liability insurer of their employer workmen's compensation payments for loss of wages, were not entitled to recover from defendant for loss of such wages in consolidated actions against defendant by plaintiffs and liability insurer.

e. Expenses of Litigation

Under the various statutes the reasonable cost of collection may be charged against the recovery before the proceeds thereof are distributed.

Where the statute so provides, the reasonable cost of collection should be charged against the proceeds of an action against a third-party tort-feasor before such proceeds are distributed.⁶³ An attorney's fee has been included in computing the reasonable cost of collection,⁶⁴ but it has also been held that neither the employee nor the insurance carrier are entitled to include an attorney's fee in the cost of collection.⁶⁵ Under some statutes the employer is entitled to receive from the recovery the amount of compensation paid without deduction for attorneys' fees or other litigation costs incurred by the employee,⁶⁶ at least where the net amount received by the employee exceeds the amount of compensation paid;⁶⁷ but the employer's reimbursement may not exceed the net amount of the employee's recovery after paying necessary expenses and attorneys' fees.⁶⁸ Under other statutes

In Pennsylvania

(1) Under post-1945 subrogation provisions of workmen's compensation act, where dependents of deceased employee received sum in settlement of wrongful death action against third-party tort-feasor, employer and his insurance carrier were entitled to receive out of such sum amount of compensation already paid without reduction by proportionate share of counsel fees for services rendered in obtaining settlement.

(2) Statute relating to subrogation of employer to rights of employee against third persons when compensable injury was caused by third person, and providing for prorating between employer and employee attorney's fees incurred in obtaining recovery or effecting compromise settlement, was intended to relate only to costs and fees and not to change basic rights, and may properly affect pending actions.

pensation payments out of sum received by deceased employee's dependents in settlement of their claim against tort-feasor, could be charged.

the recovery which inures to the employer.⁷⁰

Under some provisions, for the purpose of determining a question of an attorney's fee allowance from the proceeds obtained against a third person, it is important to distinguish whether the case is a compromise settlement⁷¹ or a contested case.⁷²

Legislative intent

Amendments of compensation law providing that an insurance carrier should have a lien on proceeds of any recovery from a third person after deduction of reasonable and necessary expenditures, including attorney's fees incurred in effecting such recovery, shows legislature's clear intent that a reasonable attorney's fee should be deducted from any recovery as a necessary expense in all instances, and that expression "actually collected," as used in compensation law before amendment, should not be construed to mean net amount collected after reduction of all reasonable and necessary expenses including attorney's fees.

Opposing claim in equitable settlement

Attorneys' fees contemplated are for prosecution of action against third person, and are not for opposing any claim which might be made in connection with equitable settlement on which employer's or carrier's pro rata share is to be based. Fla.—Insurance Co. of Tex. v. Rainey, 86 So.2d 447.

Statutory construction

Under Missouri workmen's compensation statute which provides that employer shall pay from his share of recovery a proportionate share of expenses of recovery for injuries sustained by an employee, including reasonable attorney fee whenever recovery against third person is effected by employee or his dependents, word "whenever" means "if" or "in event of" such recovery and date moneys are actually paid over in settlement of third-party action is date "recovery" is "effected."

U.S.—Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Borsari Tank Corp., C.A.N.Y., 248 F.2d 277.

Not voluntary payment

Payment by an employer of his share of recovery expenses is not a "voluntary" payment, and such payment could be asserted in subrogation action against brewery by contractor's compensation insurer which was obligated by law to make payments for deaths of contractor's employees due to brewery's breach of construction contract to provide compensation insurance for contractor's employees.

U.S.—Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Borsari Tank Corp., supra.

Prior law

Under former Missouri statute, an employer who was liable to pay workmen's compensation to dependent of a fatally injured employee was entitled to a subrogation credit out of proceeds of third-party action by employee's dependent without proportionately sharing cost of attorneys' fees.

70. N.J.—Travelers Ins. Co. v. Lumber Mut. Cas. Ins. Co. of N. Y., 89 A.2d 717, 20 N.J.Super. 265.

Statute construed

Where third-party tort recovery is had by injured workman entitled to compensation for ensuing disability under workmen's compensation act, statutory provision making employer assessable for employer's proportionate share of workman's attorney's fee, but not in excess of thirty-three and one-third percent of portion of recovery which inured to employer, means total compensation liability of employer under act, however much obligation may remain unfulfilled at time of third-party recovery, rather than compensation payments then actually made to workman.

Waiver

Right of injured employee, who has made recovery from tort-feasor, to recover share of suit expenses and counsel fee incurred in negligence case from subrogated workmen's compensation insurance carrier, should not be taken away unless burden of showing voluntary waiver by employee is sustained by adequate proof; and an agreement by injured employee to waive his right was not invalid as against public policy, but spirit of legislation imposed duty on one asserting waiver of establishing that it was made voluntarily and with full understanding of its import and consequences; and when injured employee proved that such expenses and fee had been invoked and that compensation carrier had been paid in full its lien for benefit payments made, he made prima facie case for recovery.

N.J.—McDermott v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 122 A.2d 371, 40 N.J.Super. 119.

Unjust enrichment

Any mistake or willful avoidance by third-party tort-feasor's insurance carrier of its statutory duty to inquire of workman as to counsel fees and suit expenses in negligence action before paying subrogated compensation insurance carrier full amount of latter's lien for compensation benefits paid did not relieve latter of its burden of sharing such suit expenses and counsel fees, or confer on it any greater right than it was entitled to under statute, and, in event of such mistake or willful avoidance, compensation carrier was unjustly enriched and liable to make restitution.

Statutory construction

Terms "compromise settlement" and "contested case," as used by Arkansas supreme court with respect to attorney's fee allowance provision of Arkansas workmen's compensation act, relating to deduction of costs of collection from third-party tort-feasor, were not meant to be legalistic absolutes but were intended to have practical and flexible content, as matter of allowing realistic evaluation to be made compositely of incidents of skill, preparation, efforts, relationships, and processes which had entered into production of a result and disposition of a particular situation.

72. U.S.—Hope Flooring & Lumber Co., Commercial Standard Ins. Co. v. Boulden, supra.

Where there is a settlement between an employee and the third person without a suit being contested, the settlement is a voluntary compromise settlement and the compensation commission has a right to approve the allowance of the attorney's fees and other reasonable costs of collection;⁷³ but a deduction from the proceeds of a jury verdict on a claim against the third person, as an allowance for attorneys' fees, may be approved by the court.⁷⁴ Where liability for compensation is admitted by an employer or insurer, no cost of collection may be deducted from the portion of settlement with the third-person wrongdoer except on approval of the compensation commission.⁷⁵

Failure to give notice. Where notice is not given to an employer or insurer of the employee's commencement of an action against a third-party tortfeasor in time to enable him to make a choice whether to join in the action, insurer has been held to be required to pay fees to the employee's attorney.⁷⁶

Lien. An employee's attorney has been held to have a lien for services rendered in a third-party action,⁷⁷ and it has been held that attorneys' fees are to be deducted before the lien of an insurance carrier attaches to the employee's recovery.⁷⁸

a. In General

An employer or insurer who, under the compensation act, may assert rights in respect of the liability of a third person for injury to, or the death of, an employee, is entitled to reimbursement or recovery for his own benefit to the extent of the amount of compensation paid or of the amount of the award.

Determination of meaning of term

Under Arkansas law, term "contested case," as used with respect to attorney's fee allowance provision of workmen's compensation act, may have varied meanings depending on context in which term is used, and meaning of term in a particular case must be determined from consideration of all facts and circumstances, particularly what was done and what was required to be done to bring about or to produce judgment or recovery.

U.S.—Hope Flooring & Lumber Co., Commercial Standard Ins. Co. v. Boulden, supra.

Reasonableness of attorney's fees

Where as result of diligent efforts of attorneys for injured employee and use of federal rules in taking medical testimony attorneys on contingent fee basis were without an actual trial able to convince third-party tortfeasors that fifteen thousand dollars would be reasonable recovery for death of employee, case was a "contested case," and a federal court has jurisdiction to determine reasonableness of settlement and reasonableness of attorneys' fees without approval of commission.

Exclusive or concurrent right as between employer or insurers and employee or dependents to sue and recover see supra § 1003.

Necessity for, and sufficiency of, award of, agreement for, or payment of, compensation see supra § 998.

Transfer of part or entire cause of action see supra § 996.

Purpose

(1) Purpose of compensation act provision giving employer right to share in employee's recovery from third person is to protect and reimburse nonnegligent employer for compensation payments made necessary by intervening negligence of third person.

Ill.—F. K. Kettler Co. v. Industrial Commission, 65 N.E.2d 359, 392 Ill. 564—Huntton v. Pritchard, 20 N.E.2d 53, 371 Ill. 36.

(2) Purpose of section of workmen's compensation act providing for indemnification of employer out of proceeds of recovery against third-party wrongdoer for compensation paid injured employee must be ascertained from words employed by legislature.

Ill.—Manion v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 119 N.E.2d 498, 2 Ill.App.2d 191.

(3) Primary purpose of provision of New York workmen's compensation law authorizing an employer, who has paid compensation to an injured employee, to secure reimbursement out of proceeds of employee's recovery in action against tort-feasor, is assurance of statutory compensation to employee.

Statutes construed

(1) Fact that Longshoremen's Compensation Act does not provide that employee shall have a right to compensation and damages from third-party tort-feasor is a recognition that employer has a right to reimbursement for his outlay under act out of his employee's adequate recovery from a third person, regardless of whether employer has become assignee of employee's right of action against third person, by paying compensation under an award or has paid compensation without an award.

U.S.—The Etna, C.C.A.Pa., 138 F.2d 37.

N.Y.—American Lumbermens Mut. Cas. Co. of Ill. v. Beschner, 97 N.Y.S.2d 781, 198 Misc. 375.

(2) In construing provision of federal Employees' Compensation Act that if compensation has been paid in whole or in part to an employee, who receives money in satisfaction of liability of third person, employee shall refund to United States amount of compensation which has been paid by United States, court must take words as they are and give to them a common-sense interpretation.

U.S.—U. S. v. Crystal, D.C.Ohio, 39 F.Supp. 220.

(3) Word "compensation" as used in federal Compensation Act, 5 U.S.C.A. §§ 776, 777, must be interpreted as defined in § 790 of act and means money allowance payable to an employee or his dependents and any other benefits paid for out of compensation fund.

U.S.—U. S. v. Bettis, D.C.Cal., 39 F.Supp. 160.

(4) In compensation act authorizing actions against tort-feasor and subrogating insurance carrier to extent of one-half or all of amount received or paid as compensation, words "amount received" and "amount paid" are employed in their usual, customary, and ordinary sense, and "amount" means sum, "received" means actually received, and "paid" means actually paid.

Mont.—Hardware Mut. Cas. Co. v. Butler, 148 P.2d 563, 116 Mont. 73.

(5) Amendment to workmen's compensation law relating to reimbursement to employer or insurance carrier of compensation payments when injured employee recovers for injury from a third-person an amount in excess of compensation award is remedial in nature and must be liberally construed.

N.J.—Travelers Ins. Co. v. Lumber Mut. Cas. Ins. Co. of N. Y., 89 A.2d 717, 20 N.J.Super. 265.

Employer may not be considered as not being tort-feasor to injured employee and yet be considered as joint tort-feasor with another for purpose of deducting compensation received by employee from amount of liability of tort-feasor.

to such reimbursement or recovery with interest,⁸⁰ or of the amount of the award⁸¹ under the compensation act together with certain expenses, as discussed infra subsections e, f, of this section, but may not claim any additional amount.⁸² The right of insurer to reassign to the injured employee any part of the recovery of insurer against a third person over and above what insurer must pay as compensation has, however, been denied in the absence of any statutory provision for such reassignment.⁸³

Even where the compensation act permits the employee or the dependents or personal representative of a deceased employee to recover full damages from the person who caused the injury to, or death of, the employee, as considered supra § 1038, the right may be subject to the right of the employer or insurer to indemnification or reimbursement in respect of the amount to which it is entitled,⁸⁴ especially where the employer or insurer has been made, or has become a party to the action by the employee or dependents.⁸⁵ There is no requirement, however, at least under some statutory provisions, that an employer participate in the third-party action as a condition to reimbursement.⁸⁶

Where, in an action by, or on behalf of, the employer or insurer, damages are recoverable to the same extent as though the action were by the employee or the dependents or personal representative of a deceased employee, as discussed supra § 1039, usually the employer or insurer is not entitled to retain the whole recovery for his or its own benefit,⁸⁷ but, according to some cases, in the absence of any provision as to the disposal of the excess insurer is entitled to recover and retain the full damages for

No duty to file claim

Where administrator of deceased employee brought a wrongful death action against tort-feasor and thereafter settled such claim, there was no duty on part of compensation insurer, which had paid compensation to dependent of deceased employee, to file a claim or petition until an attempt was made to make distribution of proceeds of settlement to persons other than compensation insurer.

Statute construed

Section of Longshoremen's Compensation Act providing that acceptance of compensation "under an award" shall operate as an assignment to employer of right of person entitled to compensation to damages from third person causing compensable injury does not manifest an intent to take away from employer paying compensation without an award his right to reimbursement out of his employee's recovery from third person, but requires that employer's right to subrogation for compensation payments be recognized apart from assignment, and employer by paying compensation without an award foregoes only right to control employee's right of action against third person.

Contingent liability excluded

Under provision of workmen's compensation act pertaining to reimbursement of employer on recovery by employee from tort-feasor, on recovery and receipt of damages by an employee in a tort action and reimbursement of employer, employer was discharged from its liability for further payment of preexisting award and satisfaction of such claim precluded it from serving as basis of an existing unsatisfied judgment, even though there was a contingent liability of employer for additional compensation, incapable of present adjudication.

which the third person is liable.⁸⁸ It seems, however, that such rule permitting the retention of the full damages will not be applied to defeat the interest of persons not benefited by the award of compensation, in the recovery in an action for the death of an employee, brought in a state other than that under whose act the award was made.⁸⁹

Where a deceased employee had not filed a claim for compensation and compensation was not paid to him by the employer or insurance carrier, the employer and insurance carrier are not entitled to credit against deficiency death benefits, under the compensation act, the distributive share which a dependent received from the employee's personal estate out of proceeds of a personal injury action.⁹⁰ Likewise, it has been held that an employer or insurer is not entitled to reimbursement where the employer was guilty of contributory negligence.⁹¹ An employer cannot recover for his own benefit the amount paid to the injured employee by the employer's insurer if the substantive right to recover these amounts from the third-party tort-feasor lies with insurer.⁹² The right of the employer to recover compensation paid does not, it has been held, include the right of a municipal corporation to recover amounts paid as a pension to an injured police officer which under the act could be taken in lieu of compensation.⁹³

ment because of compensation paid to the employee is purely statutory,⁹⁴ and may be waived⁹⁵ or changed by contract.⁹⁶

Compensation paid pending action. Where the employer is entitled to bring an action for payments of compensation as they become due and are paid, the view has been taken that the recovery is not limited to the amount paid when action was begun,⁹⁷ and that the amount paid up to the time of trial may be recovered.⁹⁸

Legal liability. The compensation act provides for reimbursement only where a third person or corporation is legally liable,⁹⁹ and, accordingly, an employer and insurance carrier are not entitled to reimbursement because of compensation paid to an employee injured by the United States where at the time of the injury the United States had not consented to be sued for torts,¹ and any moneys paid by the United States would be a voluntary contribution from one who was under no legal liability to make it.² Hence, the court could not impress a trust on a nonexistent fund in favor of the employer and insurance carrier.³ The payment of money by a third-party tort-feasor to people who have no legal right of recovery does not give to the insurance carrier the right of subrogation to such funds.⁴

Limitation to expenditures on account of death. Where, prior to the death of the employee, insurer made payments to, and on behalf of, the employee,

b. Lien

An employer or insurance carrier, on paying compensation to the employee or his dependents, usually has a lien on the proceeds of a recovery from a third-party tort-feasor to the extent of the obligations paid by the compensation carrier.

An employer or insurance carrier, on paying compensation to the employee or his dependents, usually has a lien on the proceeds of a recovery from a third-party tort-feasor⁶ to the extent of the obligations paid by the compensation carrier;⁷ and the employer or carrier is entitled to recoup the full amount of its lien out of the entire amount of the judgment recovered.⁸ The lien is not dependent on the employer's freedom from concurrent negligence contributing to the injury,⁹ and the judgment debtor cannot challenge the lien.¹⁰ A provision conferring a lien is applicable only where the employee takes or intends to take compensation and also desires to bring a third-party action,¹¹ and is applicable to an employer who was compelled to make a payment of increased compensation because the injured employee was a minor and was permitted to work in violation of labor law.¹² Where there is a deficiency between the amount recovered by an injured employee in a third-party action and the amount of the Conflict of laws

Where widows who had claimed workmen's compensation under Missouri law brought actions in New Jersey for damages for wrongful deaths of their deceased husbands who had entered into contracts of employment in Missouri and had been killed in compensable accidents in New Jersey, employer's and insurance carrier's right to recover on statutory lien filed in third-party New Jersey actions and amount of their recovery and conditions attached thereto were governed by Missouri law.

Not "class suit"

Pain and suffering

Compensation act, before 1931 amendment, did not contemplate that subrogation of employer to employee's rights against third-party tort-feasor should include damages recovered by employee for pain and suffering, and amendment giving employer lien on employee's entire judgment was not intended to authorize lien on segregated damages for pain and suffering, but amendment merely obligates employee to cause segregation thereof to defeat lien.

lien of the insurance carrier, the carrier must make up the deficiency between the amount actually collected as a result of the third-party action and the compensation awarded.¹³

Under some statutes, the lien may be filed at any time before satisfaction of judgment,¹⁴ and the lien attaches under the statute itself and not by reason of a notice given pursuant to the statute.¹⁵ A statutory lien provided in favor of an employer has been held not to attach to the proceeds of recovery or settlement of an action by the administrator of the employee against third persons to recover damages arising out of the employee's death.¹⁶ The lien on the proceeds of the recovery in a third-party action is wholly unrelated to an additional and statutory cause of action created in a carrier's favor arising from its payment into the special funds,¹⁷ since the payment into the funds is not compensation, as discussed supra § 366, and a satisfaction of a lien cannot possibly operate as a release of an entirely independent cause of action.¹⁸

Where the statute so provides, the lien may be satisfied either out of the proceeds of a personal injury¹⁹ or a wrongful death²⁰ action. An employee may not defeat the employer's or insurer's right to the subrogation by suing only for what are claimed to be noncompensable elements of damage.²¹

c. Amount Paid in Excess of Amount Due for Compensation

person only the amount of an award which the employer is legally compelled to pay to the employee, there should not be included in the recovery an amount paid in excess of the amount legally payable.

Where the employer is entitled to recover from a third person only the amount of an award which the employer is legally compelled to pay to the employee, there should not be included in the recovery an amount paid in excess of the amount legally payable.²² While the view has been taken that a public body is entitled to reimbursement measured by whatever amount is payable under the compensation act and not by the amount of the salary paid to its employee,²³ there is apparently authority for the view that a municipal corporation which is within the compensation act and which is required, independently of the act, to pay to an injured employee or officer his full salary during the period of disability is entitled to reimbursement or recovery to the extent of the full amount paid, although such amount is greater than is required by the compensation act.²⁴

d. Compensation Not Paid

Under some acts the employer or insurer may recover the amount of compensation which he has become liable to pay although not actually paid, or he or it may have a lien for such amount.

Under some acts the employer or insurer may recover the amount of compensation which he has become liable to pay although not actually paid,²⁵

but such right may be waived.²⁶ Where an employee died before compensation was paid to him, the right of the employer and insurance carrier to subrogation against the negligent third person has been held to be limited to the recovery in a wrongful death action,²⁷ and not to extend to the recovery by the legal representative under a survival statute.²⁸

It seems that the lien of an employer under a provision for a lien on the employee's judgment against a third person for the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation includes, in addition to payments made, payments to be made under an award of compensation,²⁹ but the employer may waive the right to claim a lien for further expenditures by failure timely to assert a claim for a lien for such expenditures,³⁰ and may estop himself to make a claim for reimbursement for such expenditures by conduct which induced the belief by the employee that no lien for such expenditures would be asserted.³¹

ever, the recovery by an employee does not include medical expenses, the employer and insurer have been held not to be entitled to reimbursement for such expenses.³⁴ Under other acts, the right to recover the expense of medical and hospital treatment has been denied in the absence of an express provision permitting recovery.³⁵

Under some statutes, whether or not specifically provided, burial expenses paid by an employer are regarded as compensation and may be recovered,³⁶ although there is authority stating that the term "compensation" as used in connection with workmen's compensation does not include funeral expenses.³⁷

Lien. It seems that the lien of the employer against the employee's judgment against a person other than the employer for expenditures for compensation, given by some acts, covers expenditures for medical, nursing, and hospital services,³⁸ but the compensation insurer, otherwise entitled to assert the lien, may waive³⁹ or, by its conduct, be

Where statute provided that in event employer's insurer, in action against wrongdoer, recovered a sum greater than that paid by insurer to employee, four-fifths of excess should be paid to employee, basis for computing employee's share was sum recovered without deductions for counsel fees or costs of litigation, since supreme judicial court could not read into statute a provision legislature did not include, or assume that deductions other than those provided for were intended; but legislature may authorize deductions for expenses of suit brought by employer's insurer against wrongdoer, in determining basis for computing employee's share of sum recovered in excess of compensation paid by insurer to employee.

titled to recover expenses and costs of investigation and of prosecution of the action even though the governing provision refers only to an employer.⁴⁷ An employer or his insurer may be entitled to attorneys' fees under the terms of the agreement between the employer and employee.⁴⁸ It has been held, however, that a contingent fee contract between an administrator and his attorneys for prosecution of a wrongful death claim is not binding on an insurer who has intervened to claim a share of proceeds as reimbursement for death benefits paid.⁴⁹

Under some provisions, the allowance of an attorney's fee is within the discretion of the court,⁵⁰ and a provision that any expenditure which the employer has paid or has become liable to pay by reason of the injury or death of an employee shall be deemed a part of the damages, including a reasonable attorney's fee, does not include an attorney's fee in the employer's action against the person liable.⁵¹

§ 1042. Apportionment and Distribution of Amount Recovered and Priorities

The purpose of subrogation provisions of the compensation law is to assure an equitable division of the proceeds of a recovery from a third person between an injured employee or his dependents and the one liable for his compensation, and in general the claim of an employer has priority over the claim of the employee, the dependents, or beneficiaries of a deceased employee.

which represents the recovery from a third person by the dependents of a deceased employee and which is subject to insurer's right of subrogation is free from a lien of the attorney for dependents where there is no excess to which such dependents are entitled.⁵⁶ Under some acts the balance after deduction of the expenses of the action and the payment to the employer of the compensation paid is paid to the employee or dependent as an advance payment on future installments of compensation,⁵⁷ or, if such remainder is in excess of the amount of future installments, in full discharge of such installments.⁵⁸

Under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act the recovery by the personal representative of a deceased employee against a third person does not result in the postponement of payment of an award of compensation for a deficiency; the due date of the installments is computed from the date of death.⁵⁹ Under the same act the expense of securing recovery from a third person responsible for injuries is a first charge against the fund recovered itself, whether the fund was created in a suit brought by the employer or one brought by the employee.⁶⁰

Jurisdiction and form of proceeding for apportionment of distribution. The authority of the trial court to make due distribution or apportionment of the amount recovered from the third-party wrongdoer, between the employee and the employer or insurer, has been recognized.⁶¹ A bill of interpleader by the person liable for the death of an employee which seeks a settlement of conflicting claims of the personal representative of a deceased employee, his dependents, and insurer who claims subrogation has been upheld as against an objection that it contained no averment that the death of the employee arose out of, and in the course of, his employment.⁶²

Verdict and judgment. While the propriety of a verdict apportioning the recovery between the person liable for compensation and the dependents of a deceased employee has been recognized,⁶³ it has

Applicability of statute

Statute vesting court with jurisdiction to determine and enforce attorney's lien was not rendered inapplicable to injured employee's third-party action by statute empowering industrial board to approve attorney's fees under workmen's compensation law; and latter statute applies solely to claims relating to awards for compensation benefits, and authority of board does not extend to third-party actions prosecuted by injured employee under process of court.

N.Y.—Jackson v. City of New York, supra.

Determination of fees

Attorney's lien for services rendered in injured employee's third-party action wherein seven thousand five hundred dollars was recovered was fixed at thirty-five per cent of judgment subject to payment of costs.

N.Y.—Jackson v. City of New York, supra.

Contingent fee

Where claimant's attorney was requested by employer's insurer to represent insurer and protect its interest in common-law action against third person by claimant, and standard one-third contingent fee was agreed on in writing for trial proceedings, and attorney recovered a judgment, which was affirmed on appeal, and insurer permitted attorney to proceed with appeal without an early objection, although insurer had knowledge of fact that attorney would claim fifty per cent of judgment as contingent fee, attorney was entitled to fifty per cent of total judgment in accordance with customary fee in such type of case.

Proper distribution

Under statute providing that in successful actions brought by injured employee against third-party tort-feasor, court is empowered to determine pro rata share of employer or insurance carrier "for compensation benefits paid," trial court erred in considering anticipated expenditures for medical care of employee in arriving at proper distribution of proceeds of judgment; and trial court erred in not charging insurance carrier with its pro rata share of court costs incurred and not taxed against tort-feasor; but court did not err in ordering reimbursement to carrier in full for amounts paid.

Fla.—Baughman v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 78 So.2d 694.

Sole jurisdiction

Circuit court is vested with sole jurisdiction of making an order of distribution of moneys recovered from negligent third party for death of workman and there is no appeal to deputy commissioner or full commissioner.

Fla.—Cushman Baking Co. v. Hoberman, 74 So.2d 69.

Equitable principles not abused

In action by employee against third-party tort-feasor, order of trial court that insurance carrier pay to employee's attorneys thirty per cent of sum allotted to carrier as pro rata share of judgment, was not an abuse of equitable principles, under statute providing for reasonable fee to be set by judge in a distribution which he may consider equitable, nor was it an impairment of employee's contract with attorneys which provided for fee of forty per cent.

been held that it is not necessary that the jury should make an apportionment in the verdict between the employee and the employer or insurer in an action to which the employer or insurer is not a party.⁶⁴ A verdict which awards to the widow and children of a deceased employee the full amount of damages for the death of the employee in an action by an employer for the use of insurer and of the dependents of the deceased employee may be objected to by defendant when in any event the widow and children were not entitled to more than the excess over the award of compensation and the employer's expenses and costs of action.⁶⁵ Under a provision of the act for the apportionment of the damages where the employer and employee join as parties plaintiff, the judgment should provide for the recovery by each of the respective amounts to which they are entitled.⁶⁶

Employer's lien on judgment against third person. Under a provision that the court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against a judgment of an employee against a person other than the employer the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation, only that amount of the judgment which is attributable to elements for which compensation may be awarded under the act is available for the application of the lien.⁶⁷ The authority to make a segregation of the amount of the judgment in respect of compensable and noncompensable elements of damages is vested exclusively in the court in which the judgment is rendered⁶⁸ and not in the state industrial accident commission.⁶⁹

§ 1043. Rights of Employee or His Dependents

An employee or his dependent may, or may not, have a right of action for malpractice against an attending physician or surgeon who aggravates the original injury.

Under a number of the acts making the remedy provided by the act exclusive, and under which any aggravation of the original injury resulting from the negligence of the employer's physician is considered compensable, as discussed supra § 207, it has been held that the employee's or dependent's right of action for negligence against an attending physician or surgeon is abrogated,⁷⁰ such action not coming within an exception to the act permitting the employee to seek damages from a third person causing the injury.⁷¹ Under such statutes, if the employee has received compensation or has settled with the employer as to the compensation he is to receive, no action may be brought by the employee against the negligent physician.⁷²

Under other statutes, however, the right of action for malpractice is not barred,⁷³ even though compensation has been allowed to the employee for the injury⁷⁴ resulting from such malpractice,⁷⁵ since such acceptance of compensation does not constitute an election of an inconsistent remedy.⁷⁶ The rule that an action for malpractice is not barred applies even where an employee of a physician goes to such physician for a treatment of an injury and the physician is negligent,⁷⁷ because in such event, the employer-doctor is a "person other than the employer" within the meaning of the compensation act.⁷⁸ Where a physician is employed by the employer to furnish medical treatment to the injured employee, such physician is, likewise, a "person other than the employer," within a statute preserving employees' common-law rights against persons other than the employer,⁷⁹ or such physician is a third person against whom the common-law rights of action by employees are preserved.⁸⁰ Un-

80. In Missouri

(1) Text rule is applicable.

Mo.—Schumacher v. Leslie, 232 S.W. 2d 913, 360 Mo. 1238.

(2) It was formerly held that injured employee who had received full compensation for original injury and aggravation of injuries caused by negligent treatment by physician was not entitled to maintain action for malpractice against physician, such physician not being "third person" within provision of workmen's compensation act authorizing action against third persons.

der a statute providing that while insurance remains in force an employer or "those conducting his business" shall be liable to the employee only as specified, an attending physician or surgeon who treats compensatory injuries does not fall within the quoted category.⁸¹ There is authority, however, that where a physician treating an injured employee acts, not as an independent contractor, but as an agent, servant, or employee of insurer or employer, no recovery may be had against him,⁸² and that an action for malpractice will not lie where the service rendered was under the medical aid contract with the employer.⁸³

Under some statutes it has been held that a settlement between plaintiff and his employer or insurer, under a compensation act by which the employer was released from all claims because of the injury to plaintiff, does not operate as a settlement or release of any claim for malpractice which plaintiff might have against the physicians who treated him.⁸⁴

There are acts under which the employee is entitled to elect whether he will proceed under the compensation act or against the physician,⁸⁵ and such election may be made on discovery of the wrong if the employee has exercised ordinary diligence.⁸⁶ Under some of such acts an employee who accepts compensation cannot maintain an action against the physician where the employee fails to make a written demand on the employer to bring the action.⁸⁷ Having elected to accept compensation, under some of the acts, the employee may not thereafter pursue his remedy against the negligent physician,⁸⁸ but an employee's acceptance of medical services from the employer does not constitute a waiver of his right to sue the physician for malpractice.⁸⁹ In order to constitute such an election as will bar his action against the physician, the compensation paid must have been for the entire injury suffered by the employee,⁹⁰ receipt of compensation for the original injury only not constituting such an election as will bar his right of action against the physician for the additional injury resulting from the physician's negligence.⁹¹

Where the settlement between the employee and his employer paying compensation expressly reserves to the employee any rights against the physician, the acceptance of compensation thereunder will not bar the action by the employee against such physician.⁹² Where an injury resulting from the negligence of the physician is not considered compensable, the right of action of the employee against such physician remains.⁹³ So, also, where the particular injury resulting from the negligence of the physician is not a compensable one, the fact that the employee received compensation therefor will not bar his action against the physician for such injury.⁹⁴

In view of the subrogation provisions of some compensation statutes, a suit by an injured employee against the physician for malpractice for the use of the employer to the extent of the compensation paid in medical expenses incurred by the employer will not lead to the double recovery of damages.⁹⁵ On subrogation of an insurance carrier to the employee's right of action against the physician for malpractice, the employee is entitled to the sum

Federal Tort Claims Act. Where a person was injured while on active service, and some time later after his discharge from the service an operation was negligently performed on him at the veterans administration hospital, he may recover from the United States under the tort claims act for the injury resulting from the negligent operation without being required to seek a relief under the compensation act.⁹⁸

§ 1044. Rights of Employer or Insurer as Subrogee or Transferee

Under some acts, on acceptance by the employee of compensation for all injuries suffered by him, his rights against a physician for malpractice pass to the employer or his insurer; and in some jurisdictions the employer or insurer has a lien against the amount of judgment recovered by the employee for the amount of expenditures for compensation.

Under a number of the acts on acceptance by the employee of compensation for all injuries suffered by him, his rights against a physician for malpractice pass to the employer or his insurer;⁹⁹ but the right of recovery has been held to depend on establishing a causal connection between the malpractice and injuries sustained in the employment.¹ Where the injury resulting from the negligence of the attending physician is not compensable under the act, as discussed supra § 207, the employer or his insurer paying compensation has no right of action against the physician for the injury to the employee.² Where, however, such injury is compensable, or where the employee is given a right of election to such compensation under the act or damages from the negligent physician, as considered supra § 1043, an employer paying compensation on the election of the employee may maintain an action against the physician,³ in the latter case even for the pain and suffering of the employee resulting from the negligent treatment.⁴

Under a statute, however, providing that the employer shall not be liable in damages for any malpractice of his physician but that any injury resulting from such malpractice shall be deemed part of the injury resulting from the accident and be compensated as such, the employer has no right of action over against such a physician in a suit by any employee against his employer for damages resulting from malpractice.⁵

Where an employee is paid an award including compensation for negligent treatment and receives a judgment for damages caused by that treatment, in order to avoid a double recovery there is a lien in favor of the employer or his insurance carrier paying compensation against the entire amount of any judgment for any damages recovered

Employee as trustee

Where employee of chiropractor received an injury in course of her employment, and thereafter chiropractor was allegedly guilty of malpractice in treatment of employee, causing her further injury, and compensation carrier for chiropractor paid one of employee's medical bills, and employee brought malpractice action against chiropractor, it was proper for judgment against chiropractor to include amount of medical bill paid by chiropractor's compensation carrier, and chiropractor's employee was statutory trustee of that portion of recovery for compensation carrier.

Want of written demand

Where employee was not entitled to maintain an action against a physician for alleged malpractice for want of written demand on employer as required by compensation act, and case was reported, employer was not entitled to a judgment on merits but, with pleadings waived, only to a nonsuit.

by the employee for the amount of expenditures for compensation.⁶ The lien has been held to attach to the entire judgment and it is not necessary to segregate the part thereof that represents damages for pain and suffering.⁷ The fact that the injury resulting from the alleged malpractice was not incurred in the course of employment does not preclude the carrier from filing a lien for any part of the compensation payments paid to the employee, since the aggravation of injuries by the physician's negligence is within the scope of the risk created by the original tortious act.⁸

The full satisfaction of an employee's judgment for malpractice does not require a dismissal of an appeal of the carrier seeking a lien, on the ground that the controversy has become moot, where the carrier filed his notice of appeal before the satisfaction of the judgment.⁹ Insurer is entitled to a lien on the judgment limited to the amount that he is required to pay because of the malpractice.¹⁰ An insurer is not relieved, by the employee's stipulation that insurer spent a certain sum as compensation payments and a certain sum for medical expenses, of the duty of correlating its lien claim with the damages recoverable in the malpractice action.¹¹

The court and not the industrial commission may have jurisdiction to fix the amount of the lien.¹²

3. PRIVATE INSURERS

§ 1045. Rights and Liabilities

The existence of workmen's compensation does not affect the right of an employee to recover on a private accident insurance policy.

Accident insurance being a matter of private contract, a compensation law providing for payment of fixed compensation to injured employees will not affect their rights to recover on accident policies.¹³

WORKSHOP. It has been said that reference to the dictionaries and lexicons discloses a wide range of definitions for the word "workshop,"¹ and ordinarily the term means a building or room where any work is carried on,² especially a handicraft;³ a building where machinery is employed in the work of fabrication;⁴ a factory or manufacturing establishment;⁵ any place where goods or products are manufactured or repaired, cleaned or sorted, in whole or in part, for sale or for wages;⁶ a shop or building where a workman, mechanic, or artificer, or a number of such, carry on their work;⁷ any plant, yard, premises, room, or place wherein power-driven machinery is employed and manual labor exercised;⁸ a place where a handicraft is carried on;⁹ a shop where any manufacture or handiwork

Employer as wrongdoer

(1) Although, as between employee, employer, and employer's compensation carrier, malpractice of employer in treating employee is compensable, in so far as injury is due to malpractice and not due to original industrial injury, carrier can recover from employer those portions of amounts paid by carrier to employee that are due to malpractice.

is carried on,¹⁰ whether for the purpose of repair¹¹ or manufacture;¹² a place where any work or handicraft is carried on;¹³ the place where the work of making, altering, etc., is done upon the product;¹⁴ and the term is also defined to mean a place in which no machinery moved or worked by any mechanical power is used.¹⁵

"Workshop" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "building" see the C.J.S. definition Building, "factory" see Manufactures § 1 c (2), and "mill" see Mills § 1 a.

The word "workshop" has been held to include a variety of establishments, places, or things,¹⁶ such as an airport or flying field,¹⁷ a barber shop,¹⁸ a cleaning and pressing establishment,¹⁹ a gas company's office,²⁰ a grain elevator,²¹ a manual training room,²² and particular property of a railroad.²³

The term has been held not to include an asphalt paving plant,²⁴ a coffee shop,²⁵ an elevator shaft,²⁶ a gasoline filling station,²⁷ a gas system manhole,²⁸ a laundry operated in connection with a nursing home,²⁹ a lot where farm implements were assembled, overhauled, adjusted, and reconditioned,³⁰ an open place on a farm where hay is baled,³¹ a plant for harvesting natural ice,³² a private house or room,³³ the projection room of a motion picture theatre,³⁴ a restaurant and confectionery business,³⁵ a retail meat market,³⁶ and a room for repairing fishing nets.³⁷

It has been said that the ordinary implication of the term "workshop," to the average person, would hardly comprehend a planing mill and various lathes, drills, saws, motors, and other electrically-driven machines and appliances used in a manufacturing plant turning out finished lumber products.³⁸

viewed as God;⁶² any form of religious service showing reverence for the Divine Being;⁶³ a religious act of reverence;⁶⁴ exhortation to obedience to, or the following of, the mandates of a Divine Being;⁶⁵ honor and homage rendered to God;⁶⁶ honor paid to the Supreme Being or by heathen nations to their deities;⁶⁷ religious reverence and homage.⁶⁸ The term is also defined as meaning the honor which is due in a peculiar sense to God;⁶⁹ and in this sense it has been distinguished from "public worship."⁷⁰

It has been said that worship consists in adoration, confession, prayer, thanksgiving, and the like,⁷¹ in the performance of all those external acts and the observance of all those rites and ceremonies in which men engage with the professed and sole view of honoring God,⁷² and supremely in making Him the object of our affection, and rendering to Him our supreme obedience,⁷³ and that it includes any and every mode of worshipping Almighty God,⁷⁴ such as prayer, praise, thanksgiving;⁷⁵ and in the ordinary church meeting the congregation is regarded as engaged in religious worship while listening to a sermon, reading the holy scriptures or hearing them read, or engaged in singing;⁷⁶ but it has been held that worship does not include healing for compensation⁷⁷ or preaching atheism.⁷⁸

nonreligious sense as meaning civil deference;⁷⁹ courtesy or reverence paid to merit or worth;⁸⁰ honor; respect.⁸¹

The verb "to worship" is defined as meaning to adore; to pay divine honors to; to perform religious exercises in honor of; to reverence with supreme respect and veneration; to venerate.⁸²

The right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience is a natural, fundamental, and inalienable right as stated in Constitutional Law §§ 206(1)-206(3), and the "liberty" which is protected by constitutional due process of law provisions embraces the freedom of an individual to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience as stated in Constitutional Law § 574.

As an adjective, the word "worsted" means consisting of worsted, or made of worsted yarn.⁸⁹

WORT. See Intoxicating Liquors § 19.

WORTH. It has been said that the word has a common use and meaning which is clearly understood,⁹⁰ and the concept expressed by the term is associated with the idea of cost or price.⁹¹ "Worth" is the quality of a thing which gives it value;⁹² that sum of valuable qualities which renders a thing valuable and useful;⁹³ value;⁹⁴ cash⁹⁵ or pecuniary⁹⁶ value.

As an adjective, "worth" is defined as meaning furnishing an equivalent for.⁹⁷

"Worth" and "compensation" have been held to be synonymous, and the terms have also been distinguished, see the C.J.S. definition Compensation. "Worth" has also been held to be synonymous with "price" see the C.J.S. definition Price, and "value" see the C.J.S. definition Value.

WORTHIER TITLE DOCTRINE. See Descent and Distribution § 44.

WORTHLESS. The word "worthless" is of relative, and not absolute, signification.⁹⁸ It is defined as meaning valueless;⁹⁹ of no value or use;¹ destitute of worth;² no value; no merit; useless.³

Under the Internal Revenue Code a taxpayer is entitled to deduct the cost of property which becomes worthless during the taxable year, and he is entitled to a deduction for corporate stock owned by him which has become worthless during the taxable year, as stated in Internal Revenue §§ 330, 331. Deductions for worthless property, debts, or stock are allowable only for the taxable year during which the property, debt, or stock became worthless, as stated in Internal Revenue § 347.

WORTHY. The word has been said to be an adjective of common use, having a definite and precise meaning,⁴ but also elastic in its meaning, according to the context in which used.⁵ "Worthy" is defined as meaning deserved;⁶ merited;⁷ possessing merit;⁸ deserving of honor, or the like;⁹ having worth or excellence;¹⁰ valuable.¹¹

"Worthy" is also defined as meaning of high station; of high social position;¹² and it is further defined to mean virtuous,¹³ or in¹⁴ or of¹⁵ good standing.

WOULD. See the C.J.S. definition Will.

WOUND. While there is some difficulty in determining what constitutes a wound,¹⁸ it has been said that the term has a well-defined, generally accepted and understood meaning.¹⁹

As a noun, the word "wound" is defined to mean a hurt;²⁰ a hurt by violence;²¹ an abrasion, breach, or rupture of the skin or mucous membrane;²² an injury to the body causing an impairment of health or strength, or rendering the person more liable to contract disease or less able to resist its effects;²³ any injury breaking or cutting the skin;²⁴ an injury to the person by which the skin is broken,²⁵ either internally or externally;²⁶ an injury to a person in which the skin or other membrane is broken, as by violence²⁷ or surgery;²⁸ a breach of the skin or of the skin and flesh,²⁹ produced by external violence;³⁰ an injury to the body of a person or animal, especially one caused by violence by which the continuity, as skin, mucous membrane, or conjunctiva is broken;³¹ any lesion of the body.³²

In a technical sense, a wound involves a breaking of the skin,³³ but in jurisprudence a wound may exist even if there is no effusion of blood³⁴ or severing of the skin;³⁵ and thus the courts have recognized that a difference exists in the meaning of the word "wound" when used as a legal term, or in legal medicine, or in medical jurisprudence, and the meaning of the word when used as a term of surgery.³⁶

Skullarily expressed

Accepted definitions of the word "wound" exclude the necessity of a breaking or cutting of the skin and are broad enough to include an injury to the subcutaneous tissue and to the skin, which has resulted from carbon monoxide poisoning and is revealed by scarlet blotches.

71 C.J. p 1622 note 46.

Medical meaning and legal meaning

"In medicine the word 'wounds' means injuries of every description that affect either the hard or soft parts of the body, and it comprehends bruises, contusions, fractures, luxations, etc. In law the word means any lesion of the body, and the correct definition of a lesion is a hurt, loss, or injury."

U.S.—Warbende v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, C.C.A.Ill., 97 F.2d 749, 753, 117 A.L.R. 760.

As a term of surgery, "wound" refers only to a solution of continuity;³⁷ and is defined as meaning any solution of the natural continuity of a tissue of the body;³⁸ a solution of the natural continuity of any of the tissues of the body;³⁹ a complete parting or solution of the external or internal skin;⁴⁰ a recent solution of continuity in the soft parts;⁴¹ a solution of the continuity of any of the tissues of the body, involving also the skin and mucous membrane of the part, caused by some external agent, and not the result of disease.⁴²

In medical jurisprudence,⁴³ and as defined in law,⁴⁴ a "wound" is any lesion of the body resulting from external violence, whether or not accompanied by a rupture of the skin or mucous membrane;⁴⁵ an injury of any kind which affects the body;⁴⁶ an injury of any description that affects either the hard or soft parts of the body.⁴⁷ The legal definitions of the term raise no question as to the nature of the tissue damaged, be it skin and appendages, bone, joint, or internal organ;⁴⁸ and the legal definitions include bruises, contusions, fractures, discolorations, and the like.⁴⁹

The word "wound" is variously applied,⁵⁰ and the term has been held to include scarlet blotches on a person's skin resulting from carbon monoxide poisoning⁵¹ and cracked lips resulting from fever;⁵² but it has been said that it is difficult to think of pallor, perspiration, dilated pupils, or a bluish tint to the skin immediately preceding death as constituting wounds.⁵³ Although doctors may consider sunburn to be a wound,⁵⁴ it has been said that to hold that the word "wound" has this signification in ordinary usage would be straining language far beyond any reasonable meaning.⁵⁵

The words "wound" and "bruise" have been held to be synonymous, and also have been distinguished, see the C.J.S. definition Bruise. "Wound" has also been compared with, or distinguished from, "injury" see the C.J.S. definition Injury.

The verb "to wound" is defined as meaning to cut, slash, or lacerate; to damage; to hurt by violence; to injure;⁵⁶ to shoot.⁵⁷ It has been distinguished from "to maim" see Mayhem § 1.

Under statutes so providing, the wanton or intentional wounding of another is an aggravated assault, and what constitutes a "wound" within the meaning of such statutes is treated in Assault and Battery § 76 c.

WRAP. The verb "to wrap" means to fold, roll, or draw together, as a cloth or flexible fabric, so as to enclose or protect something; generally with "about" or "around;" as, to "wrap" a shawl or cloak about one.⁵⁸ It is also defined as meaning to surround and cover by winding or folding.⁵⁹

WRAPPER. The broad general definition of the word is that in which anything is wrapped or inclosed; covering; envelope.⁶⁰

60. Webster New Int.D.

Under the postal laws it is an offense to mail libelous, defamatory, or threatening matter on wrappers or envelopes, as stated in Post Office §§ 47, 48, and under such statutes the word "wrapper" has been given a particular meaning as referring to the package wrapper which for convenience in mailing surrounds all the copies of newspapers, etc., sent to one office, rolled or wrapped together in one package.⁶¹

As used with reference to leaf tobacco, "wrappers" are leaves suitable for the outside finish of a cigar.⁶² The other two classes of tobacco, binders and fillers, have been distinguished, see the C.J.S. definition Fillers.

WRAPPING. That in which anything is wrapped.⁶³

WRATH. Violent anger.⁶⁴

WRECK. The meaning of the word "wreck" has been passed on in many cases arising under maritime law,⁶⁵ but outside maritime or marine law the term has no technical or legal signification.⁶⁶

The word may be used to signify one of two things, either a total or a partial destruction of the thing wrecked,⁶⁷ and thus in ordinary speech an article is said to have been wrecked when it is disabled or seriously damaged, although it may not be totally destroyed or rendered incapable of use.⁶⁸

As a noun, the word "wreck" is defined to mean the destruction, disorganization, or serious injury of anything, especially by violence;⁶⁹ that which has been wrecked or is in a state of ruin; the remains of anything ruined or fatally injured.⁷⁰

The verb "to wreck," in common use,⁷¹ is defined as meaning to destroy, disable, or seriously damage;⁷² to reduce to a wreck or ruinous state by any kind of violence;⁷³ to cause to suffer ruin;⁷⁴ to overthrow, shatter, or destroy;⁷⁵ to disorganize or cause serious injury to anything;⁷⁶ to cause to crash or suffer ruin.⁷⁷

As a verb "to wreck" has been held to be synonymous with "demolish" see the C.J.S. definition Demolish, "ruin" see the C.J.S. definition Ruin, and "smash" see the C.J.S. definition Smash.

The antonyms of "wreck" are "preserve" see the C.J.S. definition Preserve, "save" see the C.J.S. definition Save, and "salvage" see the C.J.S. definition Salvage.

The word "wreck," and its cognate terms, are treated in titles dealing with maritime matters, and for specific references consult the indexes to the titles Admiralty, Collision, Navigable Waters, Salvage, Seamen, and Shipping.

Phrases employing the word "wreck," or cognate terms, are set out in the note.⁷⁸

WRECKAGE. The act of wrecking, implying that the thing wrecked is a passive instrumentality, acted upon by some force which wrecks it.⁷⁹

"Wrinkle finishes, also known as 'Crinkle,' 'Shrivel,' 'Sag,' 'Morocco,' and by other designations, are defined as enamels, varnishes and paints which have been compounded from such materials and by such methods as to produce when applied and dried, a hard wrinkled surface on metal and other material. Wrinkle finishes are widely used as coverings for the surface of typewriters, cash registers, motors, adding machines, and many other articles of manufacture. They have the following advantages over smooth finishes such as ordinary enamels and varnishes: a. One coat of wrinkle finish is sufficient for many purposes for which two or more coats of smooth finish would be required; b. Surfaces to which wrinkle finishes are to be applied need not be prepared as carefully as those which are to receive smooth finishes, since the wrinkle finishes cover small imperfections; and c. The original appearance of wrinkle-finished articles can be maintained with less cleaning and polishing than that of smooth-finished articles."

step in prosecuting a suit;² also the judicial instrument by which the court commands something, there-in mentioned, to be done.³ Writs issued after the action was commenced are designated judicial writs as stated in the C.J.S. definition Judicial.

In modern times original writs have fallen into disuse, and most of them have been expressly abolished;⁴ and in the later practice writs are divided into original, of mesne process, and of execution,⁵ writs of mesne process being those by which interlocutory proceedings are initiated,⁶ and writs of execution being those by which the judgment or decree of the court is carried into effect.⁷ From the standpoint of their effect upon the property affected, it has also been said that writs may be divided into those pointing out, and those not specifically pointing out, the property to be seized.⁸

The word "writ" has been held to include a capias,⁹ a fee bill,¹⁰ an attachment,¹¹ an execution,¹² an order of sale in foreclosure proceedings,¹³ an order to show cause;¹⁴ and a subpoena;¹⁵ but it has been distinguished from, or held not to include, a complaint,¹⁶ a declaration,¹⁷ an execution,¹⁸ an information,¹⁹ a notice,²⁰ a peace warrant,²¹ a petition,²² a petition and libel in divorce,²³ a rule to show cause,²⁴ a summons,²⁵ or a warrant.²⁶

It is stated in Process § 1 a (1) that "process" and "writ" or "writs" are synonymous in the sense that every writ is a process.

Although many of the ancient writs are not employed in modern practice, there are certain of such writs which continue in use, and certain of the titles in this work bear the name of the ancient writs.²⁷ Other ancient writs which continue to be used in modern practice are treated in various other titles throughout this work.²⁸ of more special meaning, it has been said to be an extensive term.⁴³

In one sense the word is defined to mean a composition;⁴⁴ a letter;⁴⁵ an indorsement;⁴⁶ anything expressed in characters or letters;⁴⁷ anything written,⁴⁸ or expressed in letters,⁴⁹ or printed;⁵⁰ a paper;⁵¹ a representation addressed to the eye;⁵² a written instrument;⁵³ a written paper of any kind;⁵⁴ the written character or words;⁵⁵ words, or characters that stand for words or ideas, traced on some substance;⁵⁶ and it has been said that the term means not only words traced with a pen or stamped, but also words printed or engraved or made legible by any other device.⁵⁷

In another sense the noun "writing" is defined as meaning the act or art of tracing or inscribing on a surface letters or ideographs;⁵⁸ the act or art of forming letters or characters, on paper, parchment, wood, stone, the inner bark of certain trees, or other material, for the purpose of recording the ideas which characters and words express, or of communicating them to others by visible signs;⁵⁹ the expression of ideas by visible letters;⁶⁰ conveying our ideas to others by letters or characters visible to the eye;⁶¹ the method of originally developing the composition, and of adding copies made singly, letter by letter;⁶² and it is generally used in opposition to "viva voce."⁶³

In its most frequent and most familiar sense the term "writing" is applied to books, pamphlets, and the literary and scientific productions of authors.⁶⁴ In law it is much more frequently used to denote legal instruments, such as deeds, agreements, memoranda, bonds and notes, etc.⁶⁵ It may be on paper, wood, stone, or other material;⁶⁶ and ordinarily need not be in ink.⁶⁷ The term is not limited to words traced with a pen,⁶⁸ or brush,⁶⁹ or pencil;⁷⁰ but it has been held to include engraving,⁷¹ etching,⁷² lithographing,⁷³ motion pictures,⁷⁴ musical compositions,⁷⁵ photographs,⁷⁶ and printing.⁷⁷ It has also been held to include stamping,⁷⁸ stenographic notes,⁷⁹ stickers or pasters,⁸⁰ telegrams,⁸¹ tickets,⁸² typewriting,⁸³ and any other mode of representing words and letters,⁸⁴ unless the context or the particular statutory provision requires otherwise;⁸⁵ and it has been held that any symbols or characters in general use in communicating ideas, and generally recognized for that purpose, are sufficient and constitute "writing."⁸⁶

In particular cases or under special circumstances, the word has been held not to include judgments,⁸⁷ phonograph records,⁸⁸ mere copies of photographs,⁸⁹ perforated music rolls,⁹⁰ printed labels,⁹¹ stenographic notes,⁹² telephone conversations,⁹³ or trademarks.⁹⁴

WRITTEN (Adjective). Expressed by letters;⁹⁵ in writing.⁹⁶ It has been said that the word may refer to something engraved or lithographed,⁹⁷ or printed,⁹⁸ stamped,⁹⁹ typewritten,¹ or any mode of representing words or letters;² but it may import something more than the mere filling in of blanks.³ However, the term may be used as distinguished from "printed."⁴ In special connections it may mean contracted for.⁵

WRONG. As a noun. The word "wrong," as a noun, has more than one meaning,⁶ and frequently it is employed in a broad sense,⁷ and it is sometimes employed with an extended signification.⁸

In its broad sense, the word "wrong" means an injury;⁹ an injury to the person;¹⁰ every injury to another;¹¹ the opposite of "right."¹² The word is further defined to mean an invasion of right to the damage of the party who suffers it;¹³ the violation or invasion of a right, to the damage of the person whose right is invaded;¹⁴ an invasion of the property or civil rights of a party;¹⁵ a violation of one's right;¹⁶ a violation of the legal rights of another;¹⁷ a violation of the municipal law, the law of civil conduct, not a transgression of the divine law as such, nor a breach of etiquette;¹⁸ a trespass on the right of another;¹⁹ the breach of a legal duty;²⁰ the omission of a duty imposed by law.²¹

The word "wrong" is also defined as meaning a tort;²² "injuria" or legal injury,²³ negligence.²⁴

Blackstone has stated that, "In its most usual sense, wrong signifies an injury committed to the person or property of another, or to his relative rights unconnected with contract; and these wrongs are committed with or without force,"²⁵ and this statement has been accepted by the courts.²⁶ The Blackstone statement continues, "But in a more extended signification, wrong includes the violation of a contract; a failure by a man to perform his undertaking or promise is a wrong or injury to him to whom it was made,"²⁷ and this statement too has been accepted by the courts,²⁸ and in this connection it has been held that every breach of contract may, in a qualified sense, be considered a wrong,²⁹ and thus the word "wrong" has been defined as meaning any deprivation of right, breach of contract, or injury done by one person to another.³⁰ However, a wrong is not the injuries which result from the violation or invasion of a right,³¹ and that which the law authorizes cannot constitute a legal wrong.³²

In law, the word "wrong" imports the invasion of a legal right,³³ and to say that a person has committed a wrong is to say that he has subjected himself to a cause of action.³⁴ A wrong consists in the injury done, and not commonly in the purpose or mental or physical capacity of the person or agent doing it, since it may or may not have been done with bad motive;³⁵ the question of motive is usually a question of aggravation only.³⁶

The word "wrong" may be used as a term of morals to include a moral wrong, and as such it is not a term of pure legality;³⁷ but if the word is employed with a legal signification it signifies a legal injury,³⁸ and if it is employed with this signification

it does not reach violations of mere moral rights.³⁹

Wrongs have been variously classified, and may be either ex contractu or ex delicto,⁴⁰ or they may be public or private.⁴¹

"Wrong" has been held to be synonymous with "injury" see the C.J.S. definition Injury, and it has been contrasted with "damnum absque injuria" see the C.J.S. definition Damnum, and "injuria sine damno" see the C.J.S. definition Injuria.

As an adjective. The word "wrong" as an adjective is defined to mean contrary to law, and to the accepted standards of morality;⁴² contrary to the laws of God and man.⁴³

WRONGDOER. The word is said to import an invasion of right to the damage of the victim;⁴⁴ and may be defined as a tort-feasor;⁴⁵ a trespasser;⁴⁶ everyone who violates an express statute;⁴⁷ he who does what the law does not allow.⁴⁸

WRONGFUL. It has been said that a wide range of meaning is given to the word "wrongful" in the various dictionaries and encyclopedias.⁴⁹ The term imports the infringement of some right.⁵⁰

In its ordinary sense⁵¹ "wrongful" is defined as meaning injurious, heedless, reckless, unjust, unfair;⁵² unlawful;⁵³ negligent;⁵⁴ and it is used to describe any act which is unlawful or unauthorized, or any other act of this description which is a civil wrong, or without right.⁵⁵

In its ordinary legal sense, the word "wrongful" is not applied to that which is lawful;⁵⁶ and it has been said that the word does not necessarily convey the idea of moral turpitude⁵⁷ or involve crime;⁵⁸ and an act may be wrongful although not criminal or tortious, or in violation of a contractual duty.⁵⁹ Usually the word "wrongful" signifies a breach of legal duty, independent of contract rights;⁶⁰ but this is by no means always true.⁶¹

"Wrongful" has been held to be equivalent to, or synonymous with, "felonious" see the C.J.S. definition Felonious, "illegal" see the C.J.S. definition Illegal, and "negligent" see Negligence § 1 e.

"Wrongful" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "felonious" see the C.J.S. definition Felonious, "malicious" see the C.J.S. definition Malicious, "unlawful" see the C.J.S. definition Unlawful, and "willful" see the C.J.S. definition Willful.

WRONGFULLY. The word "wrongfully" is not a term of art in the law;⁶² but it does have an accurate meaning well known to the law, and it also has a popular and less precise signification.⁶³ It is given many interpretations and meanings according to its context.⁶⁴

"Wrongfully" is variously defined as meaning illegally, or without right;⁶⁵ in a wrong manner; unjustly; in a manner contrary to the moral law or to justice;⁶⁶ injuriously, in violation of right, or tortiously;⁶⁷ negligently;⁶⁸ unlawfully;⁶⁹ or without authority of law.⁷⁰

The word "wrongfully," standing alone, ordinarily does not convey the impression that a willful act is intended to be charged,⁷¹ and it does not necessarily imply or import dishonesty,⁷² knowledge and intention,⁷³ or without governmental authority.⁷⁴

"Wrongfully" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "by mistake" see the C.J.S. definition Mistake, "feloniously" see the C.J.S. definition Feloniously, "fraudulently" see the C.J.S. definition Fraudulently, "irregularly" see the C.J.S. definition Irregularly, "maliciously" see the C.J.S. definition Maliciously, "negligently" see Negligence § 1 e, "unlawfully" see the C.J.S. definition Unlawfully, "wantonly" see the C.J.S. definition Wanton, and "willfully" see the C.J.S. definition Willful.

It is stated in Pleading § 32 b that a mere allegation that an act was wrongfully done is a conclusion of law.

WROUGHT. Worked up or upon; manufactured; not rough or crude;⁷⁵ fitted; formed; labored; performed; worked.⁷⁶

The reverse of "wrought" is "unwrought" as stated in the C.J.S. definition Unwrought.

YAHREZEIT. In the Orthodox Jewish faith, "Yahrzeit" is an annual prayer for the repose of the soul of a dead person.⁸⁷ It is similar in purpose to masses in the Roman Catholic Church.⁸⁸

YAM. The true yam belongs to the genus "dioscorea,"⁸⁹ and may be lexically defined as the edible, starchy, tuberous root of various plants of the genus "dioscorea;"⁹⁰ but in its commercial or popular sense, as used in the Tariff Acts, it has been held to include tuberous roots which scientifically are not "yams."⁹¹

YARD. In one sense the word "yard" signifies a unit of measure, and it is treated in this sense in Weights and Measures § 1 b.

In an entirely different sense, the word "yard," by common and current acceptance,⁹² signifies an inclosure;⁹³ a small inclosed place in front of or around a house or barn;⁹⁴ an inclosure within which any work or business is carried on;⁹⁵ an inclosure, with or without buildings, devoted to some work or business.⁹⁶

While the word "yard" is generally defined as meaning an inclosure, yet, when used in connection with a dwelling, the term does not necessarily mean or suggest the idea of an inclosure, but rather the plat immediately surrounding, and upon which is situated the dwelling and other buildings used in connection therewith for domestic purposes.⁹⁷

A driveway may constitute a yard as stated in the C.J.S. definition Driveway, but it has been held that a golf course is not a yard.⁹⁸

The words "yard" and "inclosure" have been held to be synonymous, and also have been distinguished, see the C.J.S. definition Inclosure. "Yard" has also been compared with "orchard" see the C.J.S. definition Orchard.

Statutes or ordinances which are in the nature of health or zoning regulations sometimes provide for yards around dwellings. Health regulations containing such provisions are treated in Health § 22 b, and zoning regulations making such provisions are treated in Zoning §§ 48, 145.

YARDMAN. An employee who takes care of, or assists in the care of, yards and grounds.¹

YARN. In one sense the word "yarn" means any fibrous material from a natural source, whether animal, mineral, or vegetable, that is made for use in weaving, knitting, embroidery, etc.;² loosely, thread.³ Originally thread of any kind spun from natural fibers, vegetable or animal, or even mineral, but now, more usually, thread prepared for weaving as distinguished from sewing thread of any sort;⁴ something which is only spun, and produced longitudinally by the process of spinning;⁵ spun,⁶ or twisted⁷ fiber; spun wool;⁸ also a quantity of such spun material;⁹ the product of spinning a sliver;¹⁰ woolen thread; also thread of other material.¹¹ The term is also applied to stout woolen thread used for knitting, etc.;¹² and also to any of the threads forming the strand of a rope.¹³

"Yarn" has been compared with, or distinguished from, "filament" see the C.J.S. definition Filament, "strand" see the C.J.S. definition Strand, and "thread" see the C.J.S. definition Thread.

In another sense, the word "yarn" means a story;¹⁴ and, while the word is sometimes used with the implication of untruth or exaggeration, it does not necessarily convey that meaning.¹⁵ In this sense, "yarn" has been held to be synonymous with "story" see the C.J.S. definition Story.

Fleischman Yeast Co. v. Federal Yeast Corporation, D.C.Md., 8 F.2d 186, 187.

Process of manufacture described

"It multiplies by self-propagation, limited by the means of subsistence, and the quality and yield are greatly affected by the conditions under which propagation is carried on. Yeast has been manufactured for at least fifty years by inoculating a wort; that is, by preparing a clear liquid solution and stocking it with a small amount of seed yeast. Such worts include substances to nourish the 'yeast cells,' and are called 'yeast nutrient solutions.' . . . The field for investigation and improvement has been the composition of the nutrient solution, and the character of the process employed during the period of growth."

German.⁴³

"Yiddish" has been distinguished from "Hebrew" see the C.J.S. definition Hebrew.

YIELD. The word "yield," as a noun, has a customary and well-established meaning in the investment world,⁴⁴ and it is generally understood to mean the proportionate rate which the income on an investment bears to the total cost, interest excepted, on that investment, taking into consideration the time when the investment may be outstanding before being paid off.⁴⁵ While this customary and well-established meaning is a rather technical use of the word,⁴⁶ the term "yield" has another meaning which may be called a "layman's interpretation;"⁴⁷ and it may mean the net return to the original subscriber, that is to say, the cost of securing the money by issuing the securities,⁴⁸ and except in cases where a given security is issued at a premium or a discount, that is, above or below par, this net return will be the coupon rate.⁴⁹

The verb "yield" is frequently employed in nearly the same sense as "accumulate" or "produce,"⁵⁰ and in this sense it is defined as meaning to bear, to give a return for labor, or to produce;⁵¹ to give in return for labor expended or to produce as payment or interest on what is expended or invested.⁵²

In a different sense, the verb "to yield" is defined as meaning to give way,⁵³ as to superior physical force, to a conqueror;⁵⁴ to give place to;⁵⁵ to give up the contest;⁵⁶ to submit;⁵⁷ surrender; succumb;⁵⁸ to cease opposition.⁵⁹

Used in the sense of yielding up the possession of an estate, "yield" means to give as claimed of right; to give up; to resign; to surrender.⁶⁰

Yielding. As a verbal noun, "yielding" is defined to mean a giving away under physical pressure; a settling.⁶¹

As a participial adjective, "yielding" means compliant, flexible, inclined or fit to yield in any sense of the word, or inclined to give way or comply, soft, or unresisting;⁶² retractable at will.⁶³

Yielding and paying. The initial words of that clause in leases in which the rent to be paid by the lessee is mentioned and reserved,⁶⁴ which was said to be not an express covenant, but an implied one.⁶⁵

Other phrases employing the word "yielding" are set out in the note.⁶⁶

YOKE. Two animals yoked together; a pair that work together.⁶⁷

The phrase "yoke of oxen" found in various exemption statutes has been the subject of adjudication and is discussed in Exemptions § 54 a.

45. U.S.—Baltimore Mail S. S. Co. v. U. S., supra.

Stocks and bonds

"Stocks, as a rule, have no definite date of maturity. Therefore, they are usually figured as perpetual; but bonds and most other classes of investments have a fixed time to run. Therefore, the problem of determining the yield is somewhat more complicated with respect to bonds, and special tables are in use to which investors usually turn to ascertain what the net return of yield is upon bonds. Thus for example, on a bond bearing 5 per cent. interest, having exactly ten years to run before maturity, if it is sold at 108.18, that is to say, $1,081.80 for each $1,000 bond, the net yield to the investor would be 4 per cent. per annum, which is 4 per cent. for each of the ten years and is 4 per cent. upon the entire sum, $1,081.80 invested."

I. IN GENERAL§ 1. In General

Zoning, which constitutes legislative action, is the separation or division of a municipality into districts, the regulation of buildings and structures in such districts in accordance with their construction and the nature and extent of their use, and the dedication of such districts to the particular uses designed to subserve the general welfare.

Zoning is one of several types of regulation of property by a local government.¹

Although zoning regulations are of modern² or comparatively recent³ origin, they have been extensively adopted by municipalities throughout the United States,⁴ and the subject of zoning has become a very important branch of the law affecting municipal corporations.⁵

The terms "zone" and "zoning" as used in such law have a technical and artificial meaning which is different from their literary and etymological sig-

Annexed territory

Purpose of Dallas zoning ordinance applicable to newly annexed territory was to place such territory under same comprehensive zoning restrictions as apply to like territory within the city.

Roughly stated, those regulations which may be called "zoning regulations" are divided into two classes,¹⁰ those which regulate the height or bulk of buildings within certain designated districts,¹¹ that is, those regulations which have to do with structural and architectural designs of the building,¹² and those which prescribe the use to which buildings or property within certain designated districts may be put.¹³ An ordinance affecting only a single area or a few definite areas in a city is not in itself a zoning ordinance,¹⁴ although it designates that area, or those areas, by reference to their description in the zoning ordinance in effect in the city, as, for example, an ordinance forbidding loitering on the streets in business zones.¹⁵

Zoning is concerned with the use of specific existing buildings and lots, not primarily with their ownership.¹⁶ The zoning function is not confined to mere map-making.¹⁷

Zoning ordinances involve a reciprocity of benefit as well as restraint.¹⁸ A municipality has the power to regulate the use and enjoyment of property to a reasonable extent and in a reasonable manner above and beyond the constitutional authority to zone.¹⁹

Governmental and legislative function. Zoning regulations constitute the exercise or expression of a governmental function or capacity of the municipality.²⁰ Their adoption or enactment constitutes ac-

Accordingly, in passing a zoning ordinance, the municipal council is engaged in legislating and not in contracting, so that no one is bound to the municipality as a result, and the municipality binds itself to no one thereby;²⁷ a zoning ordinance is not a contract between a municipality and its citizens.²⁸ Likewise, zoning regulations are not contracts of a county.²⁹

Matter of law and not equity. Zoning, being statutory, is exclusively a matter of law and not equity.³⁰

Regulatory and penal character. Zoning ordinances are held to be of a regulatory and penal character,³¹ and the regulatory sections are separable from the penal sections.³² Under other authority, zoning is primarily prohibitive rather than regulative,³³ or zoning ordinances may be permissive in form, permitting specified uses and buildings and prohibiting all others within a district, or they may be prohibitive in form, prohibiting specified uses and buildings and permitting all others.³⁴

Safety. A zoning ordinance is not a safety statute, in the usual sense of that term,³⁵ but the general safety of the community is unquestionably improved by such ordinances.³⁶

Covenant restriction distinguished. A gulf of difference separates a zoning regulation from a covenant restriction;³⁷ what a covenantor specifically demands of the person to whom he sells his property has nothing to do with what the community, through municipal regulation, exacts of every property owner.³⁸

Effect of absence of zoning regulations. In the absence of a zoning ordinance, restrictions as to the use of property are viewed with hostility by the courts;³⁹ and in such absence an owner has the

So, subject to the requirements of building and zoning regulations, an owner of property may use it as he sees fit⁴¹ and erect a structure thereon for a legitimate purpose;⁴² and he may select the nature, location, and material for such structure.⁴³ Except as part of a valid comprehensive zoning program, a city may not prohibit a certain nature of building not violating building regulations and not dangerous or a nuisance per se.⁴⁴

The classification of realty as in a commercial use area by one purporting to act as the zoning commissioner of a county is nugatory where at the time there are no zoning regulations in the county.⁴⁵

§ 2. Purpose

The purpose of zoning, as variously stated, is to stabilize the use, and conserve the value, of property, to preserve the character of neighborhoods, and to promote the health, safety, and welfare of the community.

Broadly, the purpose of a zoning ordinance is to limit the use of land in the interest of the public welfare.⁴⁶ The essential object or purpose of zoning regulations is to stabilize the use or uses,⁴⁷ or the occupancy,⁴⁸ of property, or to stabilize a neighborhood,⁴⁹ to preserve the character of the community,⁵⁰ and to preserve the character of neighborhoods by uniform and limited use thereof in the interest of the public generally.⁵¹

Farming

Township had no power to regulate the kind of farming to be conducted on property used for farming before adoption of zoning ordinance, except in the interest of the public health. N.J.—Stout v. Mitschele, 52 A.2d 422, 135 N.J.Law 406.

Excluding prejudicial uses; protection from impairment

(1) Zoning is designed to preserve true character of a neighborhood by excluding new uses and structures prejudicial to restricted purposes of the area, and gradual elimination of such existing structures and uses.

N.J.—Moriarty v. Pozner, 121 A.2d 527, 21 N.J. 199.

(2) The two purposes of zoning act are to preserve character of a neighborhood by excluding new business and structures prejudicial to the restricted purposes of the area and gradual elimination of such existing structures and trades, and the protection of an owner's property or existing business from impairment

In other words, the purpose of zoning is to confine certain classes of buildings and uses of property to certain localities,⁵² without imposing undue hardship on property owners,⁵³ and thus to bring about the orderly physical development of the community,⁵⁴ to conserve, protect, or maintain the value of buildings or other property,⁵⁵ and to put land to which would result from enforced accommodation to new restrictions.

D.C.—Wood v. District of Columbia. Mun.App., 39 A.2d 67.

Similar statement

Purpose of zoning ordinance is to district territory of municipal corporation so that several uses for which such property may be legally employed will be, in so far as is possible, separated into zones so that greatest benefit as to one use may be achieved with least possible detriment to property employed for other uses; in other words, to separate residential districts from commercial districts and to separate both of these from property zoned for industrial use.

Flexibility

One of the objects of zoning is to protect, so far as possible, property owners in more restricted districts from activities and uses permitted in less restricted areas, but complete separation of uses is not always feasible or desirable, and zoning statutes therefore permit a certain amount of flexibility with respect to zoning ordinances and their application.

Looking backward and forward

Zoning cannot look only to the immediate present, but it looks backward, to protect districts already established, and forward, to aid development of new districts, according to comprehensive plan, based on theory that what is best for city as a whole must prevail over private interests.

Implied liability of owner

Purpose of zoning ordinance is to meet and solve problems growing out of principle that every owner of property holds it under implied liability that his use of it shall not be injurious to equal enjoyment of others having equal right to enjoyment of their property, or injurious to rights of community.

Iowa.—Call Bond & Mortgage Co. v. Sioux City, 259 N.W. 33, 219 Iowa 572.

Residence district; family life

(1) Primary purpose of a residence district created by zoning ordinance is safe, healthful, and comfortable family life, rather than the development of commercial instincts and the pursuit of pecuniary profits.

(1) Purpose of zoning is to set aside areas for specific uses and to protect them from encroachments in form of other uses inconsistent with uses to which they are dedicated.

Wis.—Town of Hobart v. Collier, 87 N.W.2d 868, 3 Wis.2d 182.

(2) One of the purposes of zoning is to furnish a protection to residential neighborhoods which will cause them to maintain themselves in a decent and sanitary way for a longer time than they otherwise would.

(3) Power to impose zoning restrictions is conferred on a town for purpose of lessening congestion in streets, securing safety from fire, panic, and other dangers, providing adequate light and air, and preventing overcrowding of lands.

N.Y.—Capri Beach Club, Inc. v. Town of Hempstead, 170 N.Y.S.2d 68.

(4) Lawfully established boundaries must be permitted to stand to accomplish legislative objects of protecting property owners in the various districts, and of preventing invasion of business into residential section.

Mass.—Bicknell Realty Co. v. Board of Appeal of Boston, 116 N.E.2d 570, 330 Mass. 676.

(5) Original and primary purpose of zoning is to divide municipality into districts, prescribing and applying different regulations in each district, according to character of lands, and structures and their peculiar suitability for particular uses, among other considerations, and uniformity of use within division.

N.J.—Hasbrouck Heights Hospital Ass'n v. Borough of Hasbrouck Heights in Bergen County, 99 A.2d 591, 27 N.J.Super. 476, reversed on other grounds 105 A.2d 521, 15 N.J. 447.

N.J.—Thornton v. Village of Ridgewood, 111 A.2d 899, 17 N.J. 499.

(7) Among the objects for which zoning law area regulations have been established are to secure quiet in residential sections, to afford adequate light, air, and sunshine, to promote sanitation, to reduce the hazards of fire, and to expedite transportation.

Md.—Carney v. City of Baltimore, 93 A.2d 74, 201 Md. 130.

(8) Ordinance providing that no part of filling station, bus terminal, etc., shall be within three hundred feet of lot line of plot on which is located building used as a theater, etc., or used as a church, etc., was not only intended to avoid traffic hazards in area where pedestrians converge on place of assemblage, but also risk of fire, and in case of a church, noises and interruptions that would interfere with worship and comfort and quiet of worshippers.

N.J.—Vine v. Board of Adjustment

The design is to promote the common good of all the people in the community,⁷⁴ or the welfare of the community as a whole,⁷⁵ rather than to further the desires or interests of a particular class, group, or individual in that community,⁷⁶ or to protect the value of the property of particular individuals.⁷⁷ So, the purpose of zoning is not to limit or restrict competition,⁷⁸ and a zoning ordinance cannot be used to control competition.⁷⁹

Control of density of population is a proper zoning objective,⁸⁰ and a commonly approved technique for that purpose is minimum building lot areas.⁸¹ So, one of the purposes of zoning is to prevent or avoid overcrowding⁸² or undue concentration of population.⁸³

Safety ranks among the purposes for the enactment of zoning ordinances.⁸⁴

§ 3. Relation between Zoning Regulations and Building Regulations

Zoning regulations are distinct in character from building regulations; but the two sets of regulations are not necessarily inconsistent, so that both sets may remain in full force at the same time.

Regulations relating to the safety and structure of buildings are designed to promote the public welfare from a standpoint wholly different from that promoted by zoning regulations,⁸⁵ and building and

Advertising

Purpose of zoning ordinance regulating outdoor advertising and excluding advertising signs in all districts unless signs directed attention to businesses located on the premises was directed toward minimizing the abuses and hazards incident to the use of such signs, and to confine their use within reasonable requirements of businesses permitted to be conducted at places of their location. zoning regulations are distinct from each other,⁸⁶ notwithstanding in a broad sense each pertains to the construction and alteration of buildings.⁸⁷ The line of demarcation is not easy to define,⁸⁸ and the dividing line must be found somewhere in the measure of the public interest sought to be protected.⁸⁹

§ 4. Relation between Zoning and Planning

"Zoning" and "planning," while closely related, are not identical, "planning" being the broader term.

While "zoning" and "planning" have been considered so closely akin as to constitute a single concept,⁹⁴ and there is a definite and harmonious relationship between them,⁹⁵ they do not cover identical fields of municipal endeavor,⁹⁶ and the terms are not synonymous⁹⁷ or interchangeable,⁹⁸ although they are sometimes used interchangeably.⁹⁹ They are not identical in concept,¹ although closely related therein,² and there is a distinction, as well as a difference, between them,³ zoning being concerned primarily

Statute held for building code and not zoning

Statute providing that fiscal court of any county shall have authority to adopt, modify, or amend, and to enforce regulations governing construction, reconstruction, remodeling, repair, and maintenance of buildings other than buildings for agricultural purposes is a building-code statute and not a zoning statute.

Zoning as implementation of planning

Planning is comprehended in inherent sovereign right to order people's affairs so as to serve common essential need under constitutional provisions granting legislature full sovereign authority, including police power, save as therein limited, and zoning is an implementation of such planning, as being concerned with common social and economic interests and needs encompassed by basic power of government to make all such wholesome and reasonable laws, not repugnant to constitution, as may be deemed to be for good and welfare of commonwealth and all subjects thereof.

3. Conn.—Kiska v. Skrensky, 138 A.2d 523, 145 Conn. 28.

Distinction stated

(1) Zoning is concerned chiefly with the use and regulation of buildings and structures, whereas planning is of broader scope and significance and embraces the systematic and orderly development of a community with particular regard for streets, parks, industrial and commercial undertakings, civic beauty and other kindred matters properly included within police power.

Ohio.—State ex rel. Kearns v. Ohio Power Co., 127 N.E.2d 394, 163 Ohio St. 451.

(2) Zoning is separation of municipality into districts, and regulation of buildings and structures in districts so created, in accordance with their construction and nature and extent of their use, while planning is term of broader significance and connotes systematic development in trying to promote common interest of municipality, particularly with relation to its future physical growth, progress and needs.

N.J.—Antonelli Const. v. Milstead, 112 A.2d 608, 34 N.J.Super. 449.

with the use of property.⁴

So, zoning may not entirely exclude planning;⁵ planning embraces zoning,⁶ in a general way,⁷ but the converse is not true,⁸ municipal "planning" being a term of broader significance than "zoning."⁹

§ 5. Nature, Source, and Scope of Zoning Power

As a general rule, municipalities have the power, which is not unlimited, to enact reasonable zoning regulations.

The power to zone, using that term in its broadest sense, comprehends the power to create building zones and to adopt zoning regulations, and to apply them, when questioned in a given situation, in harmony with their general purpose and intent so that unusual difficulties and unnecessary hardships are avoided.¹⁰

It has been said that the power of municipalities to enact zoning ordinances has been the subject of considerable discussion in recent years, resulting in conflicting decisions in various jurisdictions.¹¹ As a general rule, subject to the limitations discussed infra §§ 15-80, municipal corporations have, or may enjoy, the right or power to enact reasonable zoning regulations,¹² or, as otherwise expressed, to

U.S.—Valley View Village v. Proffett, C.A.Ohio, 221 F.2d 412.

Justification

(1) The exercise of the drastic power to zone districts for various purposes is justified only on the theory of the greatest good to the greatest number.

(2) Zoning laws regulate the use of property and may impair owners' rights therein to some reasonable extent without compensation because legislature acting under police power of the state deems free exercise of such rights detrimental to public interests, and no landowner can complain, notwithstanding he, in common with others similarly situated, may have to forego some use of his property, as long as power to enact zoning laws is exercised in public interests and for general welfare of community, reasonably, impartially, and without confiscation.

Implied authority to draw line

Authority of municipalities to zone, that is, to define and restrict permissive use of property, implies authority to draw a line and provide that on one side of line property may be, and on the other side of line property may not be, used for certain purposes.

Tenn.—Brooks v. City of Memphis, 241 S.W.2d 432, 192 Tenn. 371.

Restrictive areas along highways

Statute conferring general power on county to determine areas anywhere in county in which trades and industries may be restricted gives county power to establish restrictive areas along highways, notwithstanding statute specifically grants power to establish restrictive areas along water courses and does not specifically state that the same power may be exercised along highways.

Control of use of particular building

The act authorizing Richmond county authorities to adopt zoning ordinances as to construction of buildings and additions or repairs thereto, as to their location with respect to highways, and as to territory within zoned area within which any particular class of building can be erected, does not grant authority to control use to which a particular building may be devoted.

Ga.—Lanier v. Richmond County, 45 S.E.2d 415, 203 Ga. 39.

Constitutional provision that exercise of authority to adopt zoning ordinances shall be deemed to be within police power of state does not affect general principles applicable in determining what is proper and reasonable exercise of general powers delegated.

Del.—In re Ceresini, 189 A. 443, 8 W.W.Harr. 134.

Degradation of common-law rule

The statute authorizing cities to regulate construction of buildings therein by ordinances consistent with law gives cities no right to adopt ordinances or bylaws in derogation of common-law rule that one excavating on his own land is not liable for resulting injuries to buildings or improvements on adjoining land, in absence of actual negligence.

Mass.—Corcoran v. S. S. Kresge Co., 47 N.E.2d 257, 313 Mass. 299.

Need of people

Exercise by village of police power in enacting zoning ordinance must, in general, be kept within need of people under existing conditions.

No power to prohibit

Statutory provision that county commissioners, by resolution, may regulate size of buildings or structures and uses of land for trade, industry, and other purposes, is a clear grant of power to regulate such matters within reasonable limitations, but does not include any power, express or inherent, to prohibit.

Colo.—General Outdoor Advertising Co. v. Goodman, 262 P.2d 261, 138 Colo. 344.

Public utility

(1) First-class townships have power to zone with respect to buildings of a public utility company, subject to a determination by the public utility commission that the present or proposed situation of such buildings may be reasonably neces-

er public interests demand the exercise of the zoning power,¹⁷ and, if so, to select the measures necessary for the protection of such interests.¹⁸ In other words, the adoption of a system of zoning is optional with a municipality,¹⁹ and, where such a system has been adopted, it may thereafter be terminated.²⁰

The question whether a municipal corporation has the power to enact zoning regulations often depends on the character of the particular regulation in question,²¹ and on the surrounding conditions and circumstances.²²

A municipality having knowledge of the proposed use of certain property may by its actions be precluded from subsequently passing a zoning ordinance prohibiting such use,²³ but a city's conveyance of land which the purchaser proposed to use for a certain purpose has been held not to deprive the city of the right to restrict the use of the land by a zoning ordinance to another purpose²⁴ or to broaden the character of use permitted within the area.²⁵

With respect to zoning ordinances, the power of a municipality to "regulate and restrict" necessarily includes the power to "prohibit" certain uses of property within certain limits, to "restrict" being defined as to restrain within bounds, or to confine.²⁶

The governmental zoning power may not be forfeited by the action of local officers in disregard of the statute and the ordinance.²⁷

sary, but such townships do not have express or implied power to regulate utilities with respect to uses and structures other than building.

Pa.—Lower Chichester Tp. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 119 A.2d 674, 180 Pa.Super. 583.

(2) In view of public policy, expressed in Public Utility Code, of committing the regulation of public utilities to a commission of statewide jurisdiction, and express provision of First Class Township Law that it shall not repeal or modify Public Utility Code, a public utility corporation engaged in generating, transmitting, and distributing electric energy was not subject to zoning ordinance of first-class township with respect to location and construction of a transmission line across township.

Restriction of lawful business

District of Columbia. The commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to make and promulgate general regulations governing the matter of buildings.³⁰ As it was originally conferred and before it was limited by the zoning law, this authority was most comprehensive in character³¹ and included the power to make all kinds of building regulations, where they might reasonably be considered as relating to a proper subject,³² but not where they did not relate to such a subject.³³

There was no zoning law applicable to the District of Columbia until 1920,³⁴ but in that year congress passed an act, D.C.Code Title 25 §§ 521-530, creating a zoning commission, directing it to divide the District into height, area, and use districts and to adopt regulations specifying the height and area of buildings to be erected or altered therein and the purposes for which buildings and premises therein may be used, and empowering it to make such orders and adopt such regulations not inconsistent with law as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes and effectuate the provisions of the act. The commission may act within the limits of the power conferred on it by this statute.³⁵

§ 6. — Source of Zoning Power

The power of a municipality or county to enact zoning regulations is not inherent, but must be derived from constitutional or statutory provisions. Such provisions have generally been held valid.

The original zoning power of the state resides in the state legislature.³⁶ A municipality or county has no inherent power to promulgate or enact zoning regulations;³⁷ its power to accomplish zoning

Provision of First Class Township Law making article thereof conferring zoning power on such townships inapplicable to existing or proposed building or extension thereof used or to be used by public service corporations, if Public Utility Commission decides that present or proposed situation of such building is reasonably necessary or convenient for welfare of the public, merely gives a first-class township power to zone with respect to buildings of a public utility company, subject to determination by Public Utility Commission that present or proposed location of such buildings is not reasonably necessary, and it does not give such townships implied power to regulate public utilities by zoning ordinance with respect to uses and structures other than buildings.

Power to enact comprehensive zoning ordinance

Mich.—Osius v. City of St. Clair Shores, 75 N.W.2d 25, 344 Mich. 693.

Purpose of special zoning law applicable only to particular city was to authorize the city to regulate, systematize, and stabilize growth and development of its urban area, and fact that adoption of comprehensive zoning plan might at same time amount to regulation of location of places of business of liquor licensees, together with all other business establishments, would be only incident-tal to accomplishment of main purpose.

Villages

(1) Villages are empowered by law to adopt zoning ordinances for the purpose of promoting the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the community.

N.Y.—Union Free School Dist. No. 14 of Town of Hempstead, Nassau County v. Village of Hewlett Bay Park, 107 N.Y.S.2d 858, 279 App. Div. 618, appeal denied 109 N.Y.S.2d 175, 279 App.Div. 746.

(2) Source of the village board's power to legislate on matters of zoning is found in the Village Law.

N.Y.—Levitt v. Incorporated Village of Sands Point, 148 N.Y.S.2d 798, 3 Misc.2d 92, modified on other grounds 152 N.Y.S.2d 711, 2 A.D.2d 688, reargument and appeal denied 154 N.Y.S.2d 842, 2 A.D.2d 781.

(3) Intent of statute authorizing villages to adopt zoning regulations was to insure village inhabitants against radical zoning changes not necessitated by public demand and by changing conditions of neighborhood, which would be detrimental to their established living conditions, their property values, and most desirable use of their land.

N.Y.—Flower Hill Bldg. Corp. v. Village of Flower Hill, Nassau County, 100 N.Y.S.2d 903, 199 Misc. 344.

General law

The statutes authorizing cities and incorporated villages to regulate structures and lands for trade, industry, residence, or other purposes constitute zoning laws of state and constitute a general law applicable to cities operating under home-rule amendment.

Tex.—Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Ammons, Civ.App., 215 S.W.2d 407.

Private property

City charter providing for beautification of public properties did not prohibit zoning ordinance affecting private property only.

Single subject

Provisions of law authorizing mucounty⁴⁹ or a town⁵⁰ may be expressly empowered by statute to adopt zoning laws for specific purposes, or a county may be authorized, by a state planning act, to provide in the county zoning ordinance for reasonable and practical means for putting the master plan into effect.⁵¹

With some exceptions,⁵² such statutes have been held to be valid or constitutional,⁵³ under the police municipality to enact zoning regulations held to relate only to such subject. Okl.—In re Dawson, 277 P. 226, 138 Okl. 113.
